KEYNOTE SPEECHES

BRIDGET ANDERSON

TITLE: The European crisis facing migrants: Racism, slavery, and the right to locomotion

ABSTRACT: In this paper I will examine, not the migration crisis facing Europe but the European crisis facing migrants. I'll begin by analysing how migrants at the border are being represented in press coverage and what this reveals about the anxieties underpinning public and policy responses to immigration. I'll then look at attempts to render the institutional response to those at the borders compatible with Europe as a space of respect for human rights, and illustrate that this has meant a) the resurgence of the refugee/economic migrant distinction and b) the depiction of migrants as victims of slave traders and traffickers. I will argue that if we are looking for continuities with the slave trade we should look to the right of locomotion which was demanded by slaves, and which is precisely what European states are denying. I will end by emphasizing the importance of forging new political connections between migrants and citizens.

BIOGRAPHY: Bridget Anderson is Professor of Migration and Citizenship and Research Director at COMPAS.

She has a DPhil in Sociology and previous training in Philosophy and Modern Languages. She is the author of Us and Them? The Dangerous Politics of Immigration Controls (Oxford University Press, 2013) and Doing the Dirty Work? The Global Politics of Domestic Labour (Zed Books, 2000). She co-edited Who Needs Migrant Workers? Labour Shortages, Immigration and Public Policy with Martin Ruhs (Oxford University Press, 2010 and 2012) The Social, Political and Historical Contours of Deportation with Matthew Gibney and Emanuela Paoletti (Springer, 2013), and Migration and Care Labour: Theory, Policy and Politics with Isabel Shutes (Palgrave Macmillan, 2014). Bridget has explored the tension between labour market flexibilities and citizenship rights, and pioneered an understanding of the functions of immigration in key labour market sectors. Her interest in labour demand has meant an engagement with debates about trafficking and modern day slavery, which in turn led to an interest in state enforcement and deportation, and in the ways immigration controls increasingly impact on citizens as well as on migrants. Bridget has worked closely with migrants' organisations, trades unions and legal practitioners at local, national and international level.

MERCEDES JIMÉNEZ

TITLE: Border regimes, child mobility and academic activism.

ABSTRACT: The border is not a physical fence. Borders are spaces of non-rights and affect everyone, whether moving or not, whether migrating or not. Beginning with the process of creating Europe's southern border and its externalization to the southern and eastern Mediterranean, I am going to talk about how borders reduce rights legislatively, executively, technologically and ideologically. The narrative thread running through this analysis is the mobility of adolescents who are moving 'alone', violating these borders and calling child protection parameters into question. The response to these new forms of mobility must be constructed collectively, based on transversality and transnationalism and go beyond classic social work responses that are limited to a single region. From the position of academic activism, I propose new forms of social interventionism that incorporate the effective defence of human rights and the protection of children who are moving in inopportune ways.

BIOGRAPHY: Mercedes G. Jiménez has a doctorate in Social Anthropology and is an expert in migration, borders and human rights. She has lived and worked between Tangier (Morocco) and Andalusia (Spain) for 15 years. Her professional work has been dedicated to development cooperation (decentralized, multilateral, bilateral and NGOs) and university education in Spain, Portugal and Morocco.

As a researcher, she has focused on analysing cross-border mobility processes, migrant children and youth, the ways in which the European migration regime has crystallized, and coloniality processes and development cooperation. She has done research in Mexico and Brazil, is a member of several research groups and has a number of publications to her name. As a woman, activist and researcher, she is dedicated to the active defence of human rights and believes in networking and community work as key factors in social transformation.

LIZ FEKETE

TITLE: Between hospitality and violence: Migration, racism and the current refugee migration to Europe.

ABSTRACT: In today's Europe nationalism is resurgent and refugees and migrants are on the front line. In her keynote speech, Liz Fekete will offer an exposé of the development of civic voluntary engagement and activist responses around Europe on the one hand, and argue that Europa is facing a moral crisis on the other hand. Over the Summer, a European community of civilian volunteers appeared, seemingly from nowhere. All part of the largest transnational humanitarian collaboration in Europe's history. At the same time, politicians across Europe engaged in a reckless and dehumanising anti-migration rhetoric. Never was there more need to establish peace, not war, at Europe's borders.

BIOGRAPHY: Liz Fekete is Director of the Institute of Race Relations where she has worked for the last thirty years, and head of its European research programme. She writes and speaks extensively on aspects of contemporary racism, refugee rights, far-right extremism and Islamophobia across Europe and is author of 'A suitable enemy: racism, migration and Islamophobia in Europe'.

Liz has been an expert witness at the Basso Permanent People's Tribunal on asylum, the World Tribunal on Iraq and in 2013 gave the second annual Malmö Freedom Lecture. Her most recent publications include: 'Alternative Voices on Integration in Europe' (which foregrounds the work of youth groups and innovative anti-racist projects whose initiatives are largely ignored by the mainstream) and 'Pedlars of Hate: the violent impact of the European far Right'.

The vitality of borders: Gendered borderscapes and everyday lives.

Jana Haeberlein (University of Neuchâtel)

Migration control implies bordering practices that are always interrelated and occur at various levels and in different sites where they are being enacted as well as contested. In this way, the border equally manifests itself territorially as well as socially and culturally (Donnan 2015). Thus, bordering practices and their contestations may also be found in social and cultural spaces such as refugee support groups in a city scape. The project that this paper is developed from focuses on the border as a site of potential exclusion of people trying to enter Swiss territory. It investigates, how specifically the processes of migration control are carried out at the border; it asks how the practices of territorial border control are reflected in the bordering practices and their contestations in social and cultural spaces in a cityscape; and the project focuses on the experiences and perceptions of the border of different actors involved. The social spaces comprise fairly newly established local projects that support the well-being of asylum seekers and sans-papiers through everyday practices like joint cooking and dinners, doing sports, gardening, socializing, film screenings, etc. The aim of researching these social spaces is to grasp the everyday experiences and minor politics of contesting bordering practices by the asylum seekers and sans-papiers (and their supporters) that participate in these projects in Basel, Switzerland. The narratives and observations of the participating migrants are analysed vis-à-vis participant observation of the migration controls and formal bordering practices of the Swiss Border Guard in this borderscape. One of the main questions I wish to discuss here is how the practices in the social spaces are differently gendered compared to the often masculinist bordering practices of the Swiss Border Guard. In what ways do gender, migration control, different power relations, bordering practices and resistance to them intersect?

Militarization and activism – The case of Lampedusa.

Ilaria Tucci (University of Tampere, TAPRI)

This paper focuses on the ongoing militarization process in Lampedusa, and on the local collective Askavusa's activities. In fact, Askavusa has been recently leading a strenuous battle against the militarization of the island and especially against the radiations that the island receives constantly from military and civil radars. The Askavusa's battle, contrasting the global neoliberal policy, discourse governance, the centralized decision-making processes and governance, which do not take into consideration the local needs and voices, exemplifies how conflicts occur at glocal level. I consider that the conflict in which Askavusa is involved – the demilitarization of the Island and specifically the uninstallation of radars – represents a glocal conflict as well as Askavusa embodies a glocal movement of activism and resistance. I analyse how the collective Askavusa has perceived the changes on the island in terms of time and space in relation to the militarization process, and how their activism is developing. Data of this research are my observation during the fieldtrip that I have done in Lampedusa in October 2015 and the material that I have gathered about Askavusa and the militarization of the island (blog articles, videos, interviews, academic and scientific articles).

Critical perspectives of borders, open borders, and no border.

Harald Bauder (Ryerson University)

It is now widely accepted that borders are no longer at the border line but manifest themselves along transit routes, in workplaces, and in the everyday. In this presentation, I problematize the border concept and critically explore open-borders and no-border ideas as conditions of possibility. My exploration builds on existing literatures of borders, open borders, and no border as well as citizenship and territorial belonging, and engages a critical theory perspective drawing on Ernst Bloch's work on utopia and the possible. I illustrate my argument through examples drawn from activism related to the sanctuary-city and no-border movements. While open-borders and no-border narratives serve as powerful negation of contemporary border practices, the possibility of free human mobility would either require the reconfiguration of existing citizenship principles and practices or more substantive structural transformations. I conclude that the notions of open borders and no border operate at different layers of the utopian possibilities of mobility and belonging.

Migration, Inc.: Testing the political act of self-representation.

Mamadou Diop (Migration Inc.)

Leonie Meester (Migration Inc.)

Mainstream media have a powerful grip on the presentation of the influx of irregular migrants from Asia and Africa into Europe that we are currently experiencing. The popular European imaginary is saturated with viewpoints of migration as posing a problem, threat or burden to our European societies. Migrants have largely been the narrated objects of communication rather than being active participants within popular discourses. Where communication equals power (Castells, 2009), self-representation becomes a political act (Canevacci, 2013). The Athens-based collaborative Migration, Inc. aims to encourage and facilitate self-representation -the development of “voice” and agency- of irregular migrants within popular discourses on migration by stimulating self-narration through documentary making and blogging as well as the organisation of public discussions locally. We have recently released and are now showing our first co-created documentary. How do these migrants in Athens choose to shape their subjective migration experiences? Which conflicts arise, and how does the public respond? This case study functions as a reflection on our first experiences

Migrant spatial claims against the trap of Dublin III: challenging the exclusionary channels of asylum and citizen politics.

Martina Tazzioli (University Aix-Marseille)

In this presentation I will focus on migrant struggles in Italy against Dublin III Regulation and on their refusal to be fingerprinted in Italy claiming the right to choose the place to live in Europe. Many of the migrants protesting against Dublin III regulation are Eritreans, and therefore are in principle considered by the EU as people “in real need of protection” and who can be potentially relocated in other European countries. Yet, Eritrean migrants raised a claim that cannot be supported or contained within the existing legal framework, carrying on a radical political demand: freedom of choice – choice of the place for living. While national authorities present their struggle as a refusal to be identified, actually migrants engage against the “spatial trap” of Dublin III regulation and against the asylum procedure that would stop them in Italy. The presentation will tackle these migrant radical spatial claims from two main angles. The first one is their excess in relation to any existing legal framework, due to their demand that goes beyond the access to asylum claim and that is about the freedom to choose where living and moving. The second one concerns the relationship between visibility and temporality of migrant struggles that tends to be overlooked in political analyses.

Asylum rally and no border musical – The making of political agency.

Pouran Djampour (Malmö University)

Emma Söderman (Lund University)

By taking departure from the work of the No Border Musical and the Asylum Rally, based in Malmö in the south of Sweden, the purpose of this paper is to explore the notion of political agency. Having in common making visible and questioning migration policies, the Asylum Rally and the musical are constituted of people with and without legal status. The musical was founded in 2011 and has since then worked with writing a manuscript, shaping the ensemble and performing in the cities of Malmö, Stockholm and Norrköping. The Asylum Rally started its work of organizing in the beginning of 2013 and in the following summer the 34 days long march from Malmö to Stockholm was carried out. The aims of both organisations can be understood as making visible the consequences of migration control in contrast to the otherwise dominant discourse of refugees and undocumented persons as apolitical, universal victims in desperate need of help, entirely separated from the political, social and historical context within which they exist. In this paper we ask ourselves what these two organisations can teach us about political agency. The question that has guided this paper is: How can political agency be made possible in a society where citizenship is seen as a prerequisite for political participation? By interviewing and participating, underpinned by an activist oriented method, we conclude that perceptions of who can be a political agent are dynamic and constantly subject to challenges. Our findings show that to perform and be acknowledged as a political agent is not static and fixed but rather a re-definable and transformable process. We are also reminded that even if undocumented persons have constituted themselves as political agents, given the temporality and fluidity of political agency, they are still subject to deportation.

Performing other (Hi)Stories: Die Asyl-Monologe representation of refugees' voices in theater.

Janis Jirotko (Humboldt University, Kurt-Löwenstein Jugendbildungsstätte)

'Performing other (hi)stories' has several dimensions of meaning. Positioned outside of the national narrative and historiography, migrants' and refugees' histories are rendered invisible if they are not attached to a national framework of belonging. At the same time, the individual who is marked as the refugee, becomes the Other, the culturally unsuitable and the hyper-visible foreign. Of course, these life stories take place, even if they are 'invisible' to the public eye of an as homogenous imagined community. Performing other (hi)stories can also mean a disruption of established discourses, the act of speaking out, publicly and on stage, in a bid to claim cultural self-representation holds a deep political connotation. The actors we see on stage performing monologues of asylum are no refugees. They, as part of the citizen-nation-state construct, are performing other stories. The refugees' voices are transported through the bodies of the performers. Questions of identification, representation, ownership and moral responsibility arise through the performance of someone else's narrative. However, reflecting on the refugee in a transit position rather than as a life in status quo, can help us understand why it is important that the individuals concerned are able to move on with their lives. In times of a so-called 'refugee crisis' theaters all over Germany have started to initiate theater projects with and about refugees and offer a stage to issues of asylum. This thesis deals specifically with the prevalent issues of representation and questions of 'who speaks for whom?'. While also looking at the formation of "radical collaborations" (Bhimji) which are formed between theater makers and refugee activists and which hegemonic spaces struggles for representation are carried into.

The movement of undocumented youth in the United States – Contesting the anti-migrant hegemony beyond citizenship and legislation.

Helge Schwiertz (University of Osnabrück, IMIS)

The movement of undocumented migrant youth in the United States that has emerged over the last 15 years challenges the illegalization of migrants as well as the strategies of the broader immigrant rights movement. Especially in California, political groups are currently going beyond a focus on citizenship and legislation. Instead, they are fighting directly against the enforcement of immigration policies and the deportation and detention regime. This paper analyzes their fight for equal rights that goes beyond a mere claim for the status of US-Citizenship, but that can be perceived as an enactment of civil and human rights. While “legalization” is a principal demand for established migrant rights organizations in the US, groups like the Immigrant Youth Coalition (IYC) in California are questioning its importance. Many do not think that they have to become US-citizens, rather they fight for their rights as actual residents: defending their communities against deportations and fighting for driver licenses, health care and work permits. They criticize citizenship status because of its racist and sexist limitations and its exclusion of future migrants – symbolized in the slogan “with or without papers – we will always be illegal”. Nevertheless, they emerge as activist citizens (Isin 2009) in the process of rights claiming. Especially their public “coming out of the shadows” actions can be read as performative practices, in which they not only render their undocumented status visible, but also produce their political subjectivity as undocumented migrants. In this paper, I draw upon my research with the undocumented migrant youth movement in California, where I conducted document analysis, participant observations and qualitative interviews. Referring to approaches of critical citizenship studies and radical democracy, I argue that these undocumented youth radically challenge the deprivation of rights they face in the anti-migrant hegemony.

‘Fighting against clandestine migration’: Uncertainty, ambiguity and political participation in Morocco.

Sebastien Bachelet (University of Edinburgh)

Drawing on fieldwork amongst irregular, sub-Saharan migrants living in Morocco, this paper examines issues of uncertainty and ambiguity in relation to migrants’ political demands. It contributes to current debates over illegalization, b/ordering processes and migrants’ active participation in re-defining what it means ‘to be political’. Recent studies of citizenship, often inspired by the autonomy of migration perspective, have exposed and decentered boundaries between the citizen and the illegal migrant, thereby placing a prominent focus on migrants’ subjectivity and the radical potential of migrants’ protests. However, I argue that it is crucial not to limit an examination of migrants’ protests to a ‘host’ state and also account for their wider range of claims. In examining the birth and development of an irregular migrants’ organisation set up in Rabat ‘to fight against clandestine migration’, I illustrate how studies of migrants’ political engagement need to pay attention to issues of ambiguity and uncertainty to explore how migrants navigate the political realm.

Between borders, behind fences: detention of children asylum seekers in Australia and the European Union.

Eleonora Del Gaudio (Åbo Akademi University)

Stephen Phillips (Åbo Akademi University)

The widespread use of detention of asylum seekers as a form of border control is an acknowledged reality which carries a particular significance in cases where children are involved. Many studies provide evidence of the detrimental impact of detention, especially when those measures affect particularly vulnerable persons. The present study is a comparative inquiry on the detention of children asylum seekers in Australia and the European Union (EU). The two realities examined display significant differences, yet many commonalities can also be traced in the growingly restrictive approach to migration being favoured by many states. The right to liberty in the asylum context and the protection needs of children are addressed from a legal and practical perspective. Notwithstanding the existence of important legal guarantees, the practice of detaining asylum seeker children deserves adequate scrutiny owing to their particularly vulnerable position. Detention plays a central role in policies of deterrence and in promoting notions of strong borders. States have shown an increased willingness to pursue coercive policies in efforts to control access to their land and sea borders. States have the right to control entry to their territories, but they are also under legally binding obligations to ensure that all border control measures, including the detention of children asylum seekers, comply with international human rights law. Hence, this analysis questions the logic lying behind the capacity of states to detain children due to their migration status and identifies relevant protection gaps within the Australian and EU spheres.

Civilised Brutality: (Un)exceptional violence inside immigration detention centres.

Amanda Schmid-Scott (University of Exeter)

As Slavoj Žižek states in the opening lines of his essay, 'The Tyrant's Bloody Robe', if there is a unifying thesis that runs through the bric-a-brac of reflections on violence, it is that within violence there lies a paradox; he states that once we step back and disentangle ourselves from the lure of equating violence with acts of crime and terror, directly visible, and performed by a clearly identifiable agent, we are able to observe what he defines as 'systemic violence', the invisible 'dark-matter', the catastrophic consequences of the smooth functioning of our economic and political systems (Žižek 2009: 1). This paper brings together the ways in which violence can be understood, not simply the 'physical carnage that can tear up the body' (Norstrom 2004: 60); systemic violence possesses the quality of the unexceptional and the banal, terrible in its ability to create political inertia and hierarchies of domination and submission. I argue that immigration detention and its everyday administrative systems, techniques and disciplinary procedures serve to placate and disempower those under them, through a form of systemic violence which I call 'civilised brutality' - those processes which invisibly yet strategically cause an 'unmaking' (Bosworth 2013) of certain bodies over time. From the disorientation and disconnection caused by arbitrarily moving detainees from one centre to another, to the routine handing out of paracetamol tablets for any and every complaint or condition, these techniques interact within detention centres to render life governable and pliant. They are in themselves, a mundane, routinised form of violence, both disguised by and embedded within regulatory systems and protocols.

'Ships in the Night' Australian border security: paradigm, normative order, and negated vision of global justice.

Peter Chambers (Deakin University)

This paper examines Australian border security as a paradigmatic case, with the hope of opening dialogues as aspects of the Australian 'solution' emigrate back to Europe. I draw particular attention to Australia's vanguard use of total offshore detention, that is: a situation in which no asylum seekers are able to arrive by boat, and in which all who try to do so are permanently excluded from 'onshore' Australia. The Australian case is conspicuous as a fully enacted fantasy and a replicable policy model. Australian border security relies on offshore, a two-sided form that excludes things by including others. I look at the form of offshore as the basis for the development of a number of differential mechanisms for the integration of class domination in the age of finance capital, and examine their spread through Anglophone political formations – beyond finance into detention. Read as form, offshore is as much about empty luxury apartments in the heart of London as it is about children in indefinite detention on Nauru. Seen as agentic empirical processes, offshoring discloses border security as a normative order that sees borders as screened space, secured circulation and strategic national asset. The placement of such a normative order at the heart of a vibrant multicultural Commonwealth raises questions of actual complicity within and beyond the Australian polity. The active promotion and export of aspects of the Australian model back to Europe raises questions of global complicity and possible justice: if border security's separations are our relations, what is fair, what are we responsible for? How are we to live together in our cities with offshore detention not just 'out there', but also among us, between us, in us?

(II)legalizing fear: Preemptive deportations at the borders of the E.U. and U.S.

Austin Kocher (The Ohio State University)

In this paper, I argue that the division between legitimate and illegitimate migration is being replaced by a logic of "preemptive deportation". In the past three years, unprecedented numbers of migrants fled systemic violence in home countries and sought refuge in the United States and Europe. These migrants typically expect to receive political protections under international asylum law based on their experience of sustained violence and civil war. Yet when asylum seekers arrive at the borders of the U.S. and the E.U., they face borders that are increasingly militarized and restrictive despite nominal commitments by these countries to international human rights law. At both the U.S.-Mexico border (historically) and now at the E.U.-Turkey border, developed countries are creating new legal programs which ostensibly offer migrants an opportunity to claim asylum, but which, in practice, serve to justify the deportation of hundreds of thousands of asylum seekers. I call this new strategy "preemptive deportation", and I suggest that the legal justification for preemptive deportation hinges upon a new legal epistemology of fear that is remaking international asylum law. I elaborate on the everyday legal geographies of preemptive deportation and the legal epistemologies of fear through my experience working with migrants in family detention along the U.S.-Mexico border, and extend these conclusions to the recent E.U.-Turkey agreement designed to prevent migrants from reaching Europe. As a result of this work, I conclude that these borders are becoming legal grey zones where migrants are offered highly attenuated forms of legal protections in order to satisfy the absolute minimum expectations of ostensibly benevolent, liberal states, while at the same time deporting migrants prematurely as a part of a program to restrict in-migration as a result of widespread anxieties about racial, religious, and population-level change in the developed world.

Detention centres for foreigners in Spain: Current situation, achievements and challenges.

Ana Fornés (Campaña estatal por el cierre de los CIE)

Patricia Orejudo (Campaña estatal por el cierre de los CIE)

Since Detention Centres for Foreigners (DCF) were settled in Spain in 1985, the detained persons have suffered a systematic violation of their most basic human rights, among which the rights to privacy, identity, education, family life, access to justice, health and even life. The first part of this paper (I: “Past and current situation of the DCF”) is dedicated to illustrate about the dreadful situation of the DCF in Spain, which has been possible, to a great extent, thanks to the calculated opacity with which these centres have been directed by the Police. Nobody knew what happened there. For a very long time, the DCF were even deprived of judicial supervision. In the last years, though, the silence has been broken thanks to many different factors. The second part of the paper analyses the role of activism in the origin and development of such factors (II: “Achievements”). The third and last part of the paper (III: “Challenges”) is dedicated to disclose the paths that should be explored in order to close up these places, as the only means for fully guaranteeing human rights. To this end, two elements are taken into consideration. First, the real aim and meaning of DCF as one of the pieces of immigration policies; and second, the European dimension of such policies, which oblige to strengthen the European level of activism.

Differential deportability and access to education for irregular migrant children and disenfranchised EU-citizen children in Sweden.

Jacob Lind (Malmö University)

Maria Persdotter (Malmö University)

This article critically examines the right to education for irregular migrant children vis-à-vis disenfranchised EU-citizen children in present day Sweden, and calls into question why the former categorisation of children is allowed access to education while the latter is not. Based on a discourse analysis of relevant government reports and statements, the article compares how irregular migrant children and so-called ‘children of vulnerable EU-citizens’ are portrayed in public policy discourses. The article argues that although the decision to extend the right to education to irregular migrant children hinged on a definition of this particular right as a universal right, it nevertheless was, and remains, contingent upon the children’s potential deportability. In one key governmental report it is argued that since there are no effective controls on migration within the EU, a decision to allow ‘the children of vulnerable EU-citizens’ unrestricted access to education could provide an incentive for parents to uproot their children, and might result in an overburdening of the Swedish education and welfare systems. Instead the report proposed that social rights like education should be withheld from these children in order to stem the migration of poor and racialised EU-citizens to Sweden. We argue that the deportability and near-total exclusion of irregular migrant children from the status of citizenship allows and enables their inclusion in the social dimensions of this citizenship. In contradistinction, poor and racialised EU-citizen children who have a less precarious legal status and are significantly less deportable are, for this precise reason, excluded from accessing education and other social services. Ultimately, this paradox is an expression of how various notions of children and children’s rights are mobilised in the governance of migrations into and within the European Union.

Undocumented children and the Swedish welfare state. Citizenship and child protection in times of globalization.

Maline Holmlund (Linköping University)

In my dissertation I would like to investigate how the Swedish social welfare system construct notions of citizenship in relation to the case of undocumented children. I will be conducting interviews with local politicians, social workers and NGO representatives in two different municipalities. These have been chosen in regards to criteria such as political colour and past record in relation to undocumented children. My studies will be conducted in municipalities that have had very different approaches towards undocumented children. While the first has granted full social benefits to undocumented families with children, the latter has become known for not wanting to accept unaccompanied children and conducting political meetings against accepting them in the municipality. I will be looking at how various local welfare state representatives view their responsibility for this group and how they understand this group in terms of rights to welfare and rights to space in the Swedish society. I will be looking at how social workers talk about this category in relation to “problems” and “solutions” and how they relate their own responsibility to national legislation and NGO:s. By doing this I hope to shed light on how notions of citizenship and inclusion/exclusion within the nation state are constructed at a local level.

Precariously included: Irregular migrants, welfare and labour protection

Marry-Anne Karlsen (Uni Research Rokkansenteret / IMER Bergen)

In this paper, I propose the concept of precarious inclusion as an attempt to move conceptually beyond binary conceptualisations of legal status and portrayals of irregular migrants as simply excluded by drawing attention to the complex interplay between irregular migrants’ political exclusion and the limited and substandard protection of their basic needs in European welfare states. In Norway for example, irregular migrants are excluded from the nation-state and from mainstream welfare arrangements such as the National Insurance Scheme, yet compensatory measures caring for their biological life are still implemented with various degrees of formality. These services are of a subordinate, arbitrary, and unstable kind, and access to them are constantly undercut by the migrants’ formal exclusion. Precarious inclusion is in this sense a concept that draws attention to how inclusive measures, although well-intended, can contribute to constructing migrants’ precarity. In this paper, I will situate the concept of precarious inclusion in relation to other comparable concepts used in the field and discuss how the concept can be used to explore irregularized migrants blurry positionality as both included and excluded in relation to welfare and labour protection.

Portable welfare under the age of globalization: The comparative case study of Thai and Nordic welfare model for immigrant workers 1990-2010.

Sustarum Thammaboosadee (Thammasat University)

The presentation is the reflection of an ongoing research project which focused on the possible model of welfare protection for migrant workers in Thailand. According to the demand of competitive low cost to meet the requirement of global supply chain; it seems difficult to introduce welfare protection even for local workers. Somehow, the consecutive class struggle from civil society since 1990’s generate the ambitious policy which is hard to imagine for low-income economy like Thailand. The social security act was introduced for the first time in 1993 and became the first formal welfare protection for non-bureaucratic workers in Thailand. Following decade, the universal health care protection had been introduced which covered all Thai citizens under the standard health care provision with only 1USD levy service per time. Though the welfare revolution in two decades is welcomed by civil society but many observers suggest that it may become late revolution. According to the rise of Neoliberalism which Thai state plays the significant part as primary product producers; foot loose factory, migrant workers, globalizing financial sector had shaped the different scenario of labor power. The temporary migrant work force drastically increase since the turning of centuries. They work in an over-exploited condition. Even though the attempts of legalize process for illegal migrant workers is able to integrate migrant workers for normal welfare protection. The new problem is that most of migrant workers are young adult who are relatively less require for welfare provision and are likely to work for temporary basis. However, once they migrate their aging or unable to work bodies back home. The studies attempt to project the possible portable welfare model for migrant workers by the experience from economic history of welfare development.

Negotiating belonging through individual assessments: Two cases of social work practice in Sweden.

Vanna Nordling (Lund University)

In studies of irregular migration, it has been noticed that the borders permeate social policy and everyday welfare practices. These processes are contested not least by migrants themselves, and in some cases undocumented migrants do access services that are otherwise entitled residents. This study takes a closer look at two cases where ambiguities surrounding social rights and undocumented migrants become visible. Through interviews and document studies, social work practice is studied as one of the sometimes porous borders of the Swedish welfare state. At a policy level, the Swedish social services have not addressed undocumented migrants explicitly, but the Social Services Act does state that the municipalities have a responsibility for everyone residing at their territory. Malmö municipality deviates from other municipalities' citizenship practices in that it addresses undocumented migrants in a more far reaching way. This has given undocumented formal access to social rights, even if the right is to be assessed individually. At the everyday level, some social workers stretch and/or cross their professional boundaries in their encounters with unaccompanied minors risking deportation. The social workers sometimes go beyond what they formally are supposed to do and choose to act outside of their professional mandate. The new relationships and the spaces for acting outside of the professional mandate are however not entirely private, as they originate within a professional relation and are performed along with civil society protests. Both cases show that inclusion of undocumented migrants through social work practice is conditional and partial, but at the same time that the understanding of who is entitled to social rights is fluid. Individual assessments, regulated to a different extent, in both cases decide the actual access to the social services. This opens up for arbitrary decisions, but also for renegotiations of belonging.

Memorandum for people power: Migration, precarity and new social movements in post apartheid south Africa.

Carl-Ulrik Schierup (Linköping University)

The paper discusses issues of migration, precarity and social movements among South Africa's poor. It sets off from a vision of 'people power' as embodied in the Freedom Charter of the anti-apartheid movement, which continues to serve as an important memorandum for the South African left. It relates a continued reproduction of poverty, hyper-exploitation and unfree labour in South Africa's political economy to a rampant extractionism driven by shifting race class alliances and the constitution and reconstitution of political hegemony under shifting historical-structural conditions. On this background the author charts the development of South Africa's migratory system from apartheid's centrally managed migrant labour regime to a post-apartheid neoliberal regime marked by a rhizomatic 'flexploitation' of irregular migrants. The article goes on to discuss the continuous harassment directed against black, largely undocumented, cross border migrants from sub-Saharan Africa by members of a poor native black precariat, squeezed between informal practices of labour force management and the commodification of social welfare and provision of public services. This enigma of 'xenophobia', pitting poor 'natives' against poor 'aliens', is related to wider issues of nation and citizenship in politics for retaining and remaking political hegemony in an exceedingly unequal society, with an 'insurgent citizenship' driven by a multifarious 'uncivil society' of 'the poor' beyond the reach of neoliberal governance. This is matched by a discussion of options for a reconstituted counter-hegemonic South African left to build a renaissance of people power at a junction where migration management, combatting xenophobia and winning the loyalty of an unruly precariat in multi-ethnic townships and an informalised world of labour have become increasingly crucial stratagems.

Colonial amnesia and discontinuities in Spanish anti-racist discourse.

Mahdis Azarmandi (University of Otago, National Centre for Peace and Conflict Studies)

While there has been an increase in both border violence towards migrants as well as an increase on the limitations of rights for migrants within the country, this is only a culmination of racist practices that have long existed in Spain. Discourses on racism in Spain continue to be heavily centered on the recent rise in (im)migration and hence situate racism as a problem that targets migrants rather than racialized minorities per se. As such anti-racist organization approach anti-racism from different understandings of what constitutes race in the Spanish context. This paper looks at current anti-racist groups in Spain and resistance to racism through an analysis of whiteness and colonial amnesia. Colonial amnesia is one strategy through which white ignorance maintains white hegemony. Yet, colonial amnesia is also present where groups and organizations are challenging and fighting racism. In order to understand the politics of exclusion and death, currently most visible with the so-called border crisis, racism has to be unpacked in its historicity. Hence, this paper claims that the violence of racism is connected to the violence of social forgetting and demonstrates how anti-racism without decolonization might in fact reproduce violence.

Racism experienced and demonstrated by Chinese-speaking migrants in Sweden.

Chia-Ling Yang (National Kaohsiung Normal University, Taiwan)

Sweden introduced a new immigration policy in 2008 that encourages labour immigration from countries outside EU. After the immigration policy reform, the largest numbers of migrants comes from Thailand, India, and China. This article is part of a research project on migrants from India and China in Sweden, with a specific focus on the group of Chinese-speaking migrants in Sweden. Based on in-depth interviews of Chinese-speaking migrants from Taiwan and China, this article aims to explore racism that these migrants experience in their processes of migration as well as racism that they demonstrate against other migrant groups in Sweden. With a close analysis of these migrants' narratives and experiences, this article intends to explore the intersection of elitism and racism in the othering processes among migrants in Sweden. Although these Chinese-migrants experience different kinds of racism in their daily lives, they actively employ their class position, 'good-citizen' discourse, and Islamophobic discourse to demonstrate their 'willingness to become one of "us"' and deservingness in Sweden. I argue that by exposing the linkage between processes of othering among migrants and racist discourses in Sweden, we can understand the limit of certain resistance against racism among migrants and try to find alternatives to combat racism in Swedish society.

The 'problem' of refugees – Racism and activism.

Elizabeth Vasileva (Loughborough University)

The end of 2015 has been marked by a new wave of immigration towards the West, and a new wave of disturbing news headlines – the attacks in Cologne, Denmark' and Sweden's new border controls, nationalist sentiments in Poland, a Hungarian journalist kicking a refugee, French police tear-gassing fifteen hundred people in Calais. Fortress Europe has reached unprecedented highs of animosity. The main purpose of this paper is to trace a map of how materialist analysis can forge revolutionary trajectories without relying on loaded identity-names and categories. Taking up Deleuze and Guattari's work, it is possible to construct a strong defence of particularities against universalization and representation – the alternative to which can lead to new subjectivities being subsumed under the capitalist machine. The problems of assimilation and the co-opting of refugee crises is a real and pressing concern, but one that is easily lost in the immediate desperation of fighting to keep people alive and safe. To quote Rosi Braidotti, it is not enough to dethrone the White Man, but "what is needed is for the newcomers to be able, and to be entitled, to redefine the rules of the game so as to make a difference and make that difference felt concretely". What the role of analysis and activist academics might be in this is a question that should be under constant discussion. Drawing on my personal experiences as an activist and as an academic who sees no dividing line between the two, the core of this paper is a discussion of the types of practices that would allow for a variety of anti-racist, feminist and anti-capitalist struggles to emerge in the climate of renewed nationalism we see in Europe. This analysis, stemming from a strong materialist foundation, does not rely on essentialist understanding of identities, but instead focuses on affinity, solidarity and affirmation.

Decolonizing the "deportation turn" – Racial state and mobility control in Europe and the colonies.

Aino Korvensyrjä (University of Helsinki)

What kind of genealogies of European mobility controls can serve the struggles against the intensification of deportations today? How can we conceptualize and interrupt the racism and coloniality inherent in the current European border regime? Recent Anglo-American scholarship refers to a "deportation turn" since the 1990s in Western liberal democracies. The remarkably few historically oriented studies in this literature mostly omit the colonial experience. This paper takes the colonial time-space as a starting point to sketch out an archaeology of the current European border regime. During the formal colonial empire in Africa legal segregation aimed to immobilize the “natives” while enabling free circulation of Europeans. In the context of the EU border regime since the 1990's, are “European Apartheid” and “recolonization of migration” (Balibar) mere metaphors? I will discuss the example of German colonialism. By putting the colony in to the center I aim to unsettle basic concepts of critical migration research such as ‘citizen’, ‘alien’ and ‘borders’ as elements in a certain racial imaginary, the Westphalian narrative of the nation state (Grovogui, Koskenniemi, Anghie). I also propose to recognize the vital importance of knowledge generated in struggles against (colonial) racism. Critical academic knowledge production or scholar-activism are unthinkable without these struggles and/or without encounters, exchanges and alliances with actors and groups initiating them. I will discuss analyses developed in German self-organized refugee networks and feminisms of colour.

Serhat Karakayali (BIM, Humboldt University)

It is often emphasized that the act of opening the German borders by the end of August 2015 was a political decision of chancellor Merkel against the a bipartisan consensus - the „raison d’etat“ - of migration policy in Germany. What is underestimated in such an account is the role of civil society and grassroots organizations in support of refugees which became increasingly important over the last few years. When Merkel famously decided that „we can do this“, the paper argues, this was possible because of the growing number of volunteers throughout German society. Based on the results of a study conducted among volunteers who support refugees in different places in Germany, encompassing both individual volunteers and representatives of organisations, the paper will argue that supporting the cause of refugees has become socially acceptable within the last few years. The data was collected in November 2014 and again in November 2015, after what has been largely coined the „refugee crisis“. The number of respondents, which rose from 450 in the first survey to more than 2200 in the second allows both to provide insights in the transformation and composition of the field and the blurry boundaries between political activism and volunteering. With regard to some of the more significant data, the paper will also explore the role of the volunteer movement in challenging the European migration regime, the role of second and third generations migrants and the framing of migration politics in these movements.

Which Europe, for whom? Challenging the EU asylum policies through contested mobilities.

Elena Fontanari (University of Milan)

Rethinking the politics of refugee protection is an urgent challenge that involve the image and definition of “Europe” that we have. Here I would like to highlights the effects on the migrant subjects biographies produced by the contradictory EU policies of asylum that mix securitarian and humanitarian devices. Specifically, I will focus on the im/mobility regime and how the migrant subjects with a temporary refugee protection develop everyday practices in order to overcome, brake and turn around to the EU internal borders. Drawn on 20 months of fieldwork in Milan and Berlin using multi-sited ethnography, my work investigates the everyday experiences of a group of migrant subjects that escaped the Libya war in 2011 and landed in Italy, where they obtained humanitarian protection. Afterwards, because of difficult living condition such as homelessness and unemployment, some of them decided to move further heading north Europe, although they were not allowed under EU asylum policies. They reach Berlin, where they gave rise to a two year protest occupying Oranienplatz and claiming their right to freely move and decide where to live. After the failure of the political agreement with the local authorities, the protagonists of my research decide to live anyway in Berlin, despite their new “illegal” condition, moving back and forth between Italy and Germany in order to renew their Italian documents. The contested mobilities between the geographical and juridical borders of my research protagonists shed light on the tensions between the European border regime and the turbulent attempts to freely move enacted by the migrant subjects. It highlights the detachment between the EU asylum policies and the heterogeneity of the social reality that build Europe from below. The biographies of my research protagonists challenged the Dublin convention and Schengen agreement, which show even stronger signs of crisis today.

Rethinking the politics of refugee protection: beyond asylum and neoliberalism.

Lorenzo Vianelli (University of Warwick)

The paper reflects on the current crisis of protection in the European Union (EU) in order to develop alternative ways for conceptualising protection. Drawing from fieldwork in Italy and Sweden, it discusses two issues that mark the EU politics of protection: access to protection and type of protection. The access to protection is increasingly obstructed and limited. These restrictions highlight once again the exclusionary nature of asylum, which functions as a mechanism of differentiation between deserving and undeserving. The type of protection is more and more ineffective despite the rights written on paper. Such ineffectiveness draws our attention to the subjectivities prescribed for those protected and depicts protection as a technique of government primarily intended to manage and discipline. The paper argues that these issues results in promoting the differential inclusion of migrants in EU societies. As a result, the EU politics of protection sits within a wider project of migration management which is informed by neoliberal imperatives and therefore undermines the very idea of protection. In conclusion, the paper suggests that rethinking the politics of protection should entail both the rejection of the distinction between forced and economic migration and a radical critique of capitalist social relations.

The European Union and the ‘crisis-fication’ of human movement.

Michael Strange (Malmö University)

This presentation outlines a new research project focused on the central question: “Does the supposed refugee crisis threaten the project of European integration, or might the need for transnational coordination serve to strengthen the European Union?” The motivation to engage in this project is that what is currently described as either the ‘migrant’ or ‘refugee crisis’ poses a number of puzzles for understanding both politics and society within Europe today: First, a paradox has emerged within the heart of the EU project, around the cosmopolitan notion of hospitality (Strange and Lundberg 2014). Cosmopolitan hospitality has been at the centre of European integration and yet, in the context of the flow of migrants from North Africa and the Middle East the EU polity has increasingly focused on restricting, as well as segregating, access to hospitality within its borders. This is particularly notable where several EU Member-states are advocating for the exclusion of another EU Member-state – Greece – from Schengen. Second, whilst the crisis-fication of human movement into Europe clearly challenges the project of European integration, the ability of individual Member-states to manage migration is also dependent on strong EU-level coordination. Sweden's paradigm shift from being relatively open to refugees to having now securitised migration – most apparent in controls over the Öresund bridge with Denmark – has been explained as a response to the apparent 'failure' of European states to take their own 'fair share' of migrants. This suggests a severe failure of EU coordination, yet it also implies that the EU is necessary to protect individual Member-states from migratory pressure. In this situation, the EU's apparent 'crisis' over human migration might not actually constitute a crisis for European integration but, rather, the reverse.

Challenging the politics of 'protection': the spatial, temporal and moral production of 'refugeeness' within Europe.

Fiorenza Picozza (King's College London)

This paper looks at the entanglement of asylum and illegal migration in Europe, focusing on the way the European border regime actively produces refugees rather than receiving them, most notably through the foreclosing of any other opportunity of legal migration for a great part of the world's population. The paper seeks to challenge the idea of a politics of 'protection', by interrogating three crucial dimensions of asylum in Europe: its spatiality, temporality and morality. First, I interrogate the European legal geographies of asylum, which through agreements such as the Dublin regulation have produced a condition of hypermobility within Europe rather than offering 'safe haven'; secondly I look at the temporal framework underpinning the conceptualization of asylum, and at the way temporality is deployed as a mechanism of power over refugees, mostly in the form of waiting and of sudden disruptions (such as deportations and Dublin returns). Finally I look at the moral dimension of asylum, and at the way a politics of compassion or victimhood reasserts a politics of otherness. Each of these three dimensions contributes in different ways to a precarious machinery, which ultimately renders refugees illegalised disposable labour, catering to the needs of the European economy.

Tales of waiting and determination: Canada's controlling measures over family reunification immigration and transnational spouses' coping strategies.

Karine Geoffrion (Université de Montréal)

In the current context of (cumbersome) family reunification immigration procedures in Canada and ever increasing delays in the processing of “foreign” spouses’ files, this paper explores the strategies Canadian women married to non-Canadian men have developed in order to “make it” through the Canadian family reunification process despite the tactics exerted by the state to deter such unions. It draws on the conjugal trajectories of thirty Canadian women who are or have been in an intimate relationship with a non-Canadian man living in a “non-western” country, focusing on their experience of the family reunification process. Eight months of participant observation in two online communities of Canadian women married to or sponsoring the immigration of a non-Canadian man further enrich the discussion. I argue that the immigration of their spouse to Canada becomes, for the women, a personal and emotionally loaded project to be achieved by all means. First, I explore some of the strategies the women develop in order to see their partner “in the flesh” as often as possible, becoming experts on visa applications and on ways of bypassing international mobility restrictions. Second, I discuss how online women support networks facilitate the immigration process itself by providing concrete immigration tips, emotional guidance and an emotional outlet. Finally, I contend that the period of time where partners live apart due to length of immigration procedures also generates (inter)cultural learning and negotiation between the transnational partners. This newfound interest in the society and culture of the loved one is often fertile ground for the burgeoning of a local form of intercultural activism on the part of the women, whereby many women keep on advocating for cultural open-mindedness long after their husband has settled in Canada.

A life in the corridor: Becoming an ‘unaccompanied minor’ in Sweden.

Cecilie Lanken Verma (Global Refugee Studies, Aalborg University)

This paper is an investigation into the lives, experiences and futures of a group of ‘unaccompanied’ young boys in Sweden. The aim of the research is to follow a group of boys for the duration of three years in order to approach the much-debated phenomenon of ‘unaccompanied minors’ in the Swedish context and seek a deeper understanding of the subjective and temporal dimensions of their experiences through the asylum ‘corridor’ and beyond. While the metaphor of a ‘corridor’ is evoked to grasp the transitory spatial and temporal dimensions of subjectification and belonging in the asylum process, the paper addresses the underlying structures of temporality and subjectification that inform the reception of ‘unaccompanied minors’ and how they in turn experience and manoeuvre within these structures through different phases of asylum seeking and the time after its conclusion.

Migrant illegality’: Controlling and navigating borders in the city of Marseille.

Christine M. Jacobsen (Centre for Women's and Gender Research, University of Bergen)

The consequences of militarized borders and deaths related to illegalized migration have recently received much public attention in Europe. As Etienne Balibar (2003) noted more than ten years ago, however, borders are no longer (if they ever were) situated entirely at the outer limit of territories. Rather, the movement of bodies is controlled and governed through complex bordering practices, bringing together a number of agents, objects and technologies – creating shifting landscapes or borderscapes wherever the movement of information, people, and things is taking place and is controlled. Based on extensive ethnographic fieldwork, this paper investigates how borders materialize (and dissipate) as migrants ‘navigate’ the city of Marseille. The analytical optic of navigation (Vigh 2009) points to the mobility of bodies as well as of the borders controlling and governing bodily movement. Paying particular attention to gender and sexuality as crucial dimensions of bordering practices and their embodied consequences, the paper argues that the analytical optic of ‘navigation’ may provide different understandings of agency, bodies and borders than the ones underpinning both securitizing and humanitarian forms of governance of ‘undesirable’ migrants in Europe.

Moving populations and emancipatory spatial practices in Greece’s crisis-scapes.

Vasiliki Makrygianni (Aristotle University)

This paper aims to enlighten spaces of solidarity, emancipation, struggle and resistance that emerge in Greece’s crisis scapes due to the constant arrival, settlement and departure of migratory populations. While border areas constitute porous passages for capital goods, labor market and its components, they also function as spaces of exclusion for certain populations. The intensifying securitization of border controls, the restrictive migration politics and the consequent racialized spaces in the cities produce a nexus of death-scapes in the Greek territory. Nevertheless, both urban areas and borderlines do not act only as places of global economy and power but also as places of encounter and emancipation. Following an intersectional approach, migrants and their spaces of reference are considered not as an homogenous category but as a derivative of race, gender, class, ethnic or sex relations and differentiations. Moreover in a decolonial perspective these human streams are not seen as victims of a TINA situation but as active agents that produce their own 'heterotopias'. Furthermore, by considering space as a derivative of social relations, spatial analysis allows us to destabilize fixed categories and dipoles and brings to light dynamics and potentialities hidden in urban and regional spaces. Through a multiscalar analysis, the paper indicates how the everyday practices at the local level of the Athenian urban fabric interact with the formation of inter-local and global networks between cities, regions and border areas. Paradigms deriving from field research in Athens and in borderline areas (Lesvos, Idomeni) focus on spatial emancipatory practices that derive from encounters and conflicts. Thus, it is shown that these human streams create a nexus of emerging spaces of resistance and emancipation that come in direct opposition with the dominion policies and allow us to imagine geographies of resistance instead of fear.

Permanence pending: How Chinese temporary migrants hope to stay in the UK through relationships with permanent residents.

Hui Yan Yu (University of Edinburgh)

This study aims to investigate the ways in which some young, highly educated, lower-middle class Chinese “would-be-permanent migrants” in the UK hope to lengthen their stay and obtain higher flexibility in their chosen place of residence. They seek to explore the possibilities and constraints of achieving the goal on a daily basis by taking such steps as looking for sponsored-visa employment, or forming an intimate relationship with a permanent resident. This study looks into why the formation of a relationship with a British or EU partner is still considered as the most promising way for Chinese temporary migrants to stay in the UK for as long as they like, even though they possess adequate cultural and economic capital. The study also examines how migrants' lives are affected during the limited time remaining on their temporary visa by the need to conduct careful planning and calculation. It also analyses how everyday forms of sexual exchange through romantic and more instrumental relationships with British permanent residents, and the complex emotions associated with this, greatly shape and constitute their experiences. In addition, this research aims to provide a counter-narrative to previous studies of sexual exploitation discourse under the framework of transnational migration, which focuses on the victimhood of migrants. In contrast, I hope to address the sexual agency of Chinese migrants, and to study how sex and “love” are used as strategic tool to achieve the means to an end. I argue that the “manipulation” of sexual relationships is very often situational without being limited to sex workers or those from a lower socio-economic background, and should be understood within the webs of gender-and-ethnic based inequality; power imbalance; and social class difference in the context of Chinese migrants and their partners in the UK.

Solidarity activism, challenging Refugee Inc. The case of G4S and asylum housing.John Grayson (SYMAAG - South Yorkshire Migration and Asylum Action Group)

EU ‘reception’ policies for asylum seekers and refugees are currently in total chaos with widely differing national public policies on asylum and migration. In Northern Europe reception and detention centres and refugee housing are outsourced by national governments to international companies, private security companies and corporations, creating an asylum market and secondary asylum markets for what has been described as the European Migrant Industrial Complex. The UK offers a timely case study as historically the first EU country to outsource immigration detention centres and asylum housing or ‘low security accommodation’. The paper describes solidarity campaigning and knowledge production alongside asylum housing tenants in G4S properties in the Yorkshire and North East regions of England, from 2011 to the present. It reflects on the campaign which has challenged the largest private security company in the world through independent media, Westminster parliamentary inquiries, demos and actions - and the courage of asylum housing tenants.

Practices of self-organisation among migrants in Italy; The case of 4Stelle.Marsida Gjoncaj (Lund University)Valerio Muscella (4Stelle)Paolo Palermo (4Stelle)

The paper we would like to propose takes its impetus from the story of 4Stelle, an occupied hotel on the outskirts of Rome inhabited by a self-organised community of more than 200 families hailing from over 20 different nations. The occupants have given life to a multicultural experiment: the attempt to live together, overcoming cultural and linguistic differences. By looking at the 4Stelle case, our paper aims to shed light into practices of self-organisation among migrants in Italy: how does a community who lack resources mobilize collectively to claim their right to housing; what are the opportunities offered to this community and how do they make use of them? More broadly the paper is concerned with the experiences of ordinary people (grassroots level) and their contentious politics. It also seeks to explore the development of such movements and processes associated with it. In exploring the determinants and modes of migrant mobilizations, this paper builds on theories of social movements of the passage from individual suffering to collective action. The everyday life of 4Stelle inhabitants is captured on a web-doc (www.4stellehotel.it), which the co-directors (Valerio Muscella e Paolo Palermo) would be happy to discuss at the conference.

Activism beyond movement: New spaces, new forms, new subjectivities.Isabel Meier (University of East London)

Spaces of activism have always been conceptualised as private in the sense of everyday activism (Chatterton, 2007; Martin, Hanson & Fontaine, 2007) or implicit activism (Horton & Kraftl, 2009) and/or public as “grandiose, iconic events”. However, recent events around migrant activism show that mobilisation also occurs in spaces neither public nor, strictly speaking, private such as detention centres. Consequently, along with new spaces, a new form of activism emerges: immobile activism. While mobile activism made a first appearance in academic and public debate following the migrant protest marches in France, Germany and Sweden in 2013 and 2014, comparatively little attention has been paid to immobile forms of activism and its epistemological consequences. This is due to the fact that subjects of social movement studies are supposedly free to move. Beginning analysis and engagement from exceptional spaces of activism such as detention centres, I will argue that immobile activism challenges the foundational precepts central to the sociology of social movements relating to mobility, political subjectivity and space and new spaces, new forms and new subjectivities of activism emerge. This project attempts to make a contribution to the emerging critique of a too narrow conceptualisation of activism by examining spaces, subjectivities and mobility that fall outside of what epistemologically comes to be called activism. Activism at “the systemic edge” (Sassen, 2015) emerges within particular contexts that define to a large extent the repertoire of visibility, space, subjectivity and mobility available.

“Nous sommes ici! We are here!": irregular migrants' urban struggles for belonging and urban citizenship in Brussels.

Afra Dekie (Independent pre-doc researcher; Activist)

For irregular migrants, their everyday lives in the city are strongly shaped by experiences of urban exclusion, in visible ways (when denied access to particular urban spaces following surveillance and control) and in invisible ways (when socially and politically excluded from the city). These in/visible borders in the city are not only shaped by (urban) local, but also by national and transnational border regimes and migration policies and politics. Nonetheless, border regimes are also strongly challenged by irregular migrants, particularly when the city (or specific urban localities) become a site for contesting, negotiating and articulating belonging and urban citizenship. This paper, based on ethnographic fieldwork, focuses on the urban struggles of irregular migrants in Brussels. When mobilizing, irregular migrants in Brussels often formulate their claims through spatial practices such as marches, demonstrations, and the occupation of buildings in the inner city. Although mostly revolving around claims for obtaining a legal residence status, these mobilizations equally express claims for “a right to the city” as well as the reframing of citizenship regimes, based instead on the presence and residence of irregular migrants within the city (suggesting a politics of the inhabitant, Purcell). In this way, irregular migrants have gained increasing visibility in the urban public sphere (their actions have been largely tolerated by authorities). Yet, in the past months, challenges for mobilizing have arisen from changing local, national, and transnational border regimes and migration policies and politics, including the “refugee crisis” of 2015 (which has shifted political attention away from regularization towards asylum policies), the politicization (and partly criminalization) of the nearby “refugee camps” in Calais and Dunkirk, the militarization of Brussels following the November 2015 Paris attacks, and internal conflicts obstructing collective action

The body-border: Governing irregular migration through biometric technology.

Helle Stenum (Roskilde University)

Biometric identifiers (finger prints, iris scans etc.) have increasingly become a key element in technology of EU border and migration management, and this development takes place against a backdrop of a booming biometric industry preoccupied with technical solutions on government technology such as national ID, passports and ‘mobility-access-devices’. Furthermore soft biometrics such as ‘facial recognition’ is promoted now by the industry-community of migration management as less regulated, less intrusive, fast and flexible. Soft Biometrics, focussing on height, skin and hair colour, clothes, and any other characteristic that distinguish one person from all others, is described as the way forward in separating the wanted from the unwanted migrants at the border and on the territory. This paper discuss both recent technological developments as well as biometric technology in a historical context and explore the apparent biometric divide between citizens and migrants, the latter positioned and managed technologically as risks through surveillance and storage of data, whereas citizens are managed as holders of access to privileges. The technique however of both circuits is using bodily coded information emphasizes the general tendency of ‘securitization of identity’ (Rose 1999, 2000). Focus in this particular kind of governmental technology is the technified ‘gaze of the governor’ (Rose 1999), tracking and scanning through enormous amounts of data to identify the specific, bodily difference that singles you out as object for surveillance and control, and at the same time subjectifying the human being as container of a physical, essential and unique identity. Essential identities are constructed in the fabric of the biometric systems as materialised social categorizations of gender, class, ethnicity, sexuality, migrant-status etc.

Borders as embodied and affective.

Leila Whitley (University of Konstanz)

This paper explores the ways that an understanding of borders as related to racialised embodiment is central to understanding contemporary practices of bordering. In border theory, the implementation of borders has increasingly come to be understood as existing at least as much ‘inside’ of the space of the nation as ‘outside’ of it. In the context of Europe the location of borders has been queried following the integration of the Schengen zone. In this space, formal borders at the territorial limits of nations have been dissolved, but bordering practices continue to appear in force throughout and beyond national space, leading scholars to describe European borders as ‘deterritorialised.’ Simultaneously, in the very different political context of the US, new tactics in immigration policing, such as the use of so-called ‘attrition through enforcement’ legislation that seeks to multiply immigration sites throughout the space of everyday life, also raise questions about the location of the border. Drawing on both of these sites, in this paper I ask what the movement of borders to the space of everyday life can tell us about the structure of borders, and about both what and where they are. I argue that understanding the ways borders address embodied populations differentially, so that some bodies move freely while other bodies are threatened by borders when they try to move, is crucial to understanding borders more broadly. I also argue that in addition to being understood as bodily, borders must be understood in relation to the life conditions they generate and their affective effects. If some bodies are read as not belonging, and their presence constantly put into question, then part of what this paper will explore is the way that bodily vulnerability to the implementation of the border generates affects that are essential to the border’s work: to reaffirming the ease of presence of some while maintaining others in a state of uncertainty and precarity.

“It is a racial profiling that is neither reasonable nor lawful...it is racism”: Racialized (b)order-making in Sweden.

Sarah Philipson (Lund University)

Suruchi Thapar-Björkert (Uppsala University)

The political imperative of the ‘civic integrationist turn’ in the ‘making of citizens’, inadvertently excludes undesirable individuals and ethnic collectives, while also regulating threatening and monitoring them through disciplinary regimes and different forms of immobilisation such as border management and internal identity controls (Khosravi 2011). These political processes, we would argue, contribute to the racialized making of the ‘stranger’ in one central way: the practices of ‘internal foreigner controls’ constructs citizenship as normatively reserved for the white Swedish subject, where ‘color bars’ are projected onto non-white bodies, thus constructing them as a threat to the ‘purity of the white nation’. This contributes to the construction of some bodies as citizens, quasi citizens or as non-citizens bodies. We explore this through the narratives of police officers, who in a sense convert politics into practice through the implementation of state policy (Ekman 1999). Engaging with interviews is thus a way to emphasise the negotiations of the police practices that construes, denies and configures the identity of the Swede in the enactment of ‘internal foreigner controls’, and thus simultaneously constructs the foreigner. The actions of the police acquire legitimacy through the politically sanctioned construction of the ‘foreigner’ that has been apparent in political debates and public statements the last couple of years. As such, we examine the fragility of citizenship, and interrogate the negotiations inherent in police practices in the discrepancy of border practices and between those seen as ‘belonging’ and those projected as ‘deviant’. Our argument will be exemplified through an analysis of political debates in Swedish news media and in-depth qualitative interviews with police officers (as state functionaries). Theoretically we draw on postcolonial and critical race theory, and empirically engage with discourse analysis and content analysis.

Making space desirable – Border regions as multistable figures.

Lynn Musiol (Hamburg University)

The decision of the Hungarian government to close its border to Serbia and to erect a fence as a reaction to the ‘European Refugee Crisis’ has fueled border discourses on how to deal with the ‘influx’ of refugees coming to Europe. Border areas at Europe’s margins can be identified as an assemblage of actors, materiality, negotiations and relations. Additionally, interweaved techniques of governing, exposing and steering the refugee’s body become evident. Drawn on Simon’s approach on social infrastructure and Holzhey’s theoretical stand of multistable figures, I conducted fieldwork in three border regions (Hungary, Croatia and Turkey). I propose to identify these border regions as horizontal architectural entities embedded in a highly relational sphere of connectivity and movement. In investigating border regions through an infrastructural lens, mutual performances and trajectories between actors and materiality become visible and tangible. The fieldwork provides insight into some of what defines bits and pieces of contemporary border-refugee-relations. Rather than articulating their Janus-faced conception, it outlines the border region as a multiple layer in which affective and uncertain space emerges.

The construction of the citizenship of young refugees: A policy analysis and ethnographic study in Belgium.

Lesley Hustinx (Ghent University)

Rachel Waerniers (Ghent University)

Scholars agree that international migration challenges a national conception of citizenship. It puts the nation-state as the only source of authority for citizenship under pressure and uncovers the exclusionary mechanisms inherent to this conception of citizenship. National governments are adopting even more restrictive policies as a response to the increasing numbers of asylum seekers. But at the same time, refugees are told to integrate as fast as possible in the society. Scholars state that these tensions are transforming the concept of citizenship. However, there is little empirical research on this possible transformation. As research shows that the way refugees and their citizenship are discursively constructed in policy plays an important role in the integration process of refugees, we want to investigate how the refugees' citizenship practices interact with the policy discourses to construct their citizenship position. For this purpose we conducted a discourse analysis of the migration policies in Belgium between 2011 and 2014 focusing on how the citizenship of refugees is framed and what kind of citizenship is allocated to them and an ethnographic study focusing on the reactions of young refugees towards these discourses. In line with critical theories of citizenship we make use of a broad definition of citizenship. Our analysis shows that refugees are denied agency as full citizens in migration policies by categorizing migrants as profiteers and criminals or as victims. Within the group of refugees, young refugees are often approached as victims and even more vulnerable. Participant observation and in-depth interviews with young refugees provide insight in their different trajectories towards political awareness and creation of subjectivities in light of these discourses. In this paper we show that policy discourses and the practices of refugees do not produce a dichotomy between citizens and non-citizens, but that a more complex gradation comes about.

“The undocumented migrant” in legislation processes.

Mervi Leppäkorpi (University of Eastern Finland)

In Sweden and Finland there have been campaigns for granting access to health for undocumented migrants leading to a legislation process. The definition of “undocumented migrant” varies in both cases and in both cases the definition still excludes groups out of the universal access to health services. I look into the civil society argumentation in Finnish and Swedish legislation process documents to see, how “the Undocumented Migrant” has been presented and who are the chosen groups and persons to do it. I will compare documents to find out, where are the differences and similarities in defining the deserving group and (re)presenting it.

The construction of the figure of the immigrant and the birth of immigration laws.

Andrew Crosby (GERME – ULB)

This article analyses through an historical lens how the policy of expulsion of foreigners in Belgium was born and how it transformed through time. Relying on the analysis that the rise of state intervention in the last quarter of the 19th century, which elevated nationality as demarcation criterion, I say that these changes can only fully be understood if we take into account the ideological origins and use of the policies. Hence, the paradigm of the state of exception is used to describe the policies that specifically targeted political opponents and destitute foreigners. Lastly, following Garfinkel's theory of degradation ceremonies, I analyse how framing the foreigner as an unethical subject was an important step in legitimising the exceptional power of expulsion.

Enacting migrants, minorities and the nation: On the double social life of statistical categories.

Francisca van Gromme (Goldsmiths, University of London)

Stephan Scheel (Goldsmiths, University of London)

Though statistical 'matters of fact' feature prominently in the arguments of anti- and pro-migration advocates alike, critical migration studies scholars have so far largely refrained from interrogating or even engaging in the production of migration-related statistics, discarding them as 'number games' and 'control knowledge' instead. Starting from the premise that statistics are important means for constituting migration, ethnic minorities and populations more generally as intelligible objects of government, this paper explores the role that categories play in the process of counting populations into being. Based on ethnographic research in statistical institutes in Estonia and the Netherlands, the authors demonstrate how statistical categories do not just account for an existing population, but rather help to bring it into being in particular ways. To this end, the authors make – illustrated through the categories of the 'Caribbean Netherlands' and the 'third-generation migrant' – three interrelated arguments: First, statistical categories are not reducible to neutral definitions of groups of people to be quantified. Rather, statistical categories are always already social categories that carry particular histories, political projects and imaginations which in turn entail tacit assumptions about the real. Due to these tacit assumptions, statistical categories are, secondly, not only part of the social worlds they seek to describe. Rather, statistical categories are also constitutive of these social worlds. In the case of population statistics, we argue third and finally, that categories do not only enact populations in particular ways, but also help to narrate and consolidate particular accounts of 'the nation'. From this follows that statistical categories, and the processes of boundary drawing implied by them, offer a valuable vantage point on the narratives through which a given nation imagines itself.

The intercultural double absence of the migrant. Good will and desire for control.

Walter Stefano Baroni (University of Manchester)

Intercultural discourse is characterised by its good will to create a space for communication and exchange between natives and foreigners – or, more concretely, between immigration societies and their migrants. In this paper, more specifically, it is regarded as a linguistic area where different kinds of enunciation overlap: from the discourse of the social sciences involved in a sort of intercultural enlightenment, to the autobiographical speaking out of migrants committed to raising consciousness on interculturality. While interculturality is directly promoted by the EU on a European level, I will discuss the Italian situation as a highly significant case study. As a consequence of the wars and social crises impacting nearly all Southern Mediterranean countries, migration pressure has dramatically increased on Italian shores over recent years. The arrival of new migrants brings with it a heightened fear of immigrants, producing a racist outburst, fostered by populist parties. Intercultural awareness has been called upon to confront these circumstances – has it been up to this challenge? To answer this question, this article examines scientific and fictional texts promoting interculturality in Italy in accordance with the critical discourse analysis approach, with a particular emphasis on Foucault's contribution. Results of this investigation indicate an overall failure of the intercultural approach to tackling racism and fear of the other. The figure of the migrant fluctuates between ethnical stereotypes and his/her apotheosis as a herald of a new world of differences, because the intercultural discourse cannot recognise his/her right to be “normal”: migrants can only exist in a state of exception. To use a phrase borrowed from Abdelmalek Sayad, this is the double absence of the migrant within intercultural discourse: he/she exists as a sketchy silhouette or as an exceptional being, but never as a political subject.

Monitoring ethnic diversity: A Latin American experience in the UK.

R. Rodriguez Pau (SRCF)

Dissemination of report on recognition of Latin Americans as a group in the UK which was conducted during 2013-2014. Elements of identity and needs of former refugees and asylum seekers as well recent secondary migration of Latin Americans from Spain to UK are explored. There are different contexts of time, space and reasons for migration of Latin Americans to the UK. Nevertheless, Latin Americans in the UK seem to be having a great many common needs regardless of the fact of their being diverse communities themselves (e.g. nationality, ethnicity, gender, language, and so forth). The report chronicles the advocacy movements of Latin Americans in London from 2000 until 2014, its practices and their aim(s) as to the practical benefits about the fact of being formally recognised as a group by the state. Examples of certain degree of 'positive discrimination', but not 'affirmative action' as it is the present style portrayed in the Americas (USA/Brazil as case studies), are discussed for playing a key role in the facilitation access to services, improvement on education opportunities, working conditions and welfare provision to disadvantaged minorities rather than being as a tool for surveillance in itself. The report presents a number of recommendations and provisional conclusions with regards to the on going work and developments of advocacy groups/movements of the Latin American diaspora in Europe. Honour-based violence, migrant status and access to justice: Findings from a study of migrant women living in the UK.

Geetanjali Gangoli (University of Bristol)

Aisha K. Gill (University of Roehampton)

Natasha Mulvihill (University of Bristol)

In 2015, we were commissioned by the Inspectorate of Constabulary for England and Wales (Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary - HMIC) to identify and interview victims and survivors of 'honour'-based violence (HBV) for a thematic inspection of police forces across England and Wales (HMIC, in press). The researchers were required to use the definition of HBV adopted by HMIC, as a form of violence which draws legitimacy from the notion of 'honour'. HMIC requested that forced marriage (FM) and female genital mutilation (FGM) be included within the scope of the research in recognition of their separate yet related status to HBV. Our paper presents key findings from this project. The work was notable in a number of respects. Over a 10-week period, the research team worked with NGOs to identify and interview 50 women across England (35 individual interviews and 3 group interviews totalling 15 participants) who were the victims and survivors of HBV and/or FM (n=36) or FGM (n=14). Our participants were first or second generation migrants from 15 different countries of origin/or ethnicity, and interviews were conducted in 9 different languages. Focused primarily on their decision whether or not to report HBV to the police in the UK and their subsequent treatment by the police and criminal justice system, the participants related in extraordinary detail their stories of victimisation and survival. Drawing on the findings, we offer an analytical framework regarding migrant women in the UK's experiences of HBV, which explores the particular layers of legal-political, social, familial, cultural and psychological control which combine to define their experience. Within this paradigm, immigration status intersects with immigration law and border control to exacerbate and complicate women's experience of HBV. Finally, we consider what this means for policy and policing practice in the UK.

"Women's space is everywhere!": Border narratives – A study of lived experiences and political discourse.

Marie Witt Gad Johansen (Aalborg University)

Silje Garnås Kristiansen (Aalborg University)

Ida Gunge (Aalborg University)

As part of a larger trend within the EU, the borders adjacent to Denmark are currently strongly enforced through border controls. At the same time Denmark and Sweden are introducing several alterations in their respective asylum policies. This project explores this exceptional episode in current Danish history, through discursive policy analysis and collecting of narratives from women who are planning to seek asylum in Scandinavia. Power, security and gender are central factors in examining the concept of a border. We thereby analyse the narrative of the political elites, who are constructing the current changes in border and asylum policies, as well as the narrative of the ones who ultimately are affected by these changes; asylum seekers planning to cross a border into Northern Europe. Another layer to the project is formed through a gender perspective, as the narratives are told by asylum seeking women who are navigating a traditionally male field. With this project we wish to shed a new light on the European political debate on borders and migration, as the different narratives contribute to deepen the understanding of contrasting perceptions of borders and their functions.

At the borders of gender: Deconstructing the boundaries of gender as a feminist political category to engage the governing of immigration in contemporary Italy.

Stefania Donzelli (Erasmus University - International Institute of Social Studies)

This paper discusses the multidimensionality of gender as a feminist political category employed to engage the phenomenon of human mobility and its governing. To this end, the essay scrutinises feminist narratives produced on and from lived experiences of political struggles contesting and contrasting the current governmental rationality regulating immigration in Italy. In particular, it brings into focus feminist narratives on the gendering of securitization in immigration policy, migrants' administrative detention and protection of victims of trafficking, death and disappearances in the Mediterranean. Then, it examines the conceptualizations of gender proposed in these feminist narratives, deconstructing the boundaries of this category of political practice. Indeed, this paper intends to illuminate the multidimensionality of the meaning of gender in its current feminist usages, both in terms of its articulation and mutual constitution with other social relations of power – particularly relations of race – and in terms of its composition and transformation in respect to transnational dynamics – such as international migratory movements and their government. In doing so, the paper points out limits, potentialities, and tensions underlying these feminist conceptualisations of gender. Theoretically, this essay seeks to produce an original contribution at the interface of the Autonomy of Migration approach, Intersectionality, and Transnational Feminism. To this purpose, the paper discursively analyses the following primary sources: in-depth interviews' transcripts with feminist activists and various types of feminist documents such as communication statements, flyers, and zines. This material was collected during one year of fieldwork and it covers experiences of feminist organizing on the governing of immigration in Italy from 2007 to 2013.

Making feminist arguments and strategies against borders and regulated migration.

Disa Helander (Gothenburg University)

This paper discusses theoretical critiques and practical resistance to regulated migration and to borders more generally. My aim is to explore how we can make strong arguments and strategies against borders and regulated migration and, more specifically, to discuss this by exploring what feminist theory can contribute to the theorising and critique of borders and regulated migration. I do this by discussing what I have grouped into five different types of arguments against regulated migration: (1) arguments by Giorgio Agamben, (2) arguments focusing on citizenship, (3) arguments focusing on labour and capital, represented by Nicholas De Genova, (4) arguments from the perspective of indigenous peoples and that focus on the racialising aspect of borders, represented by Harsha Walia, and (5) arguments that focus on how borders produce many kinds of subjects, represented by Bridget Anderson. I analyse these five approaches by reading each of them through feminist interventions, as well as through what I have learnt through my engagements in activist work against regulated migration. I argue that strong arguments and good strategies must connect borders/regulated migration to various power relations; conceive of borders and regulated migration as productive/constitutive of subjects, social and political relations, and imaginaries; and must not secure the freedom of movement (and freedom to stay) for some people at the expense of that of others. I discuss, among other things, the normative constitution of citizenship and of deservingness, as well as the division and relation between reformist and revolutionary strategies, in this case how we can understand and negotiate, on the one hand, a principled rejection of certain institutions and practices – for example the migration authorities – with on the other hand, a sometimes immediate need to engage with these institutions and practices in order to secure the most basic needs of undocumented migrants.

Feminist fieldwork and migration control: Reflections from the migrant route through Mexico.

Sara Alemir (Lund University)

This paper is based on the challenges and choices I faced during engaged fieldwork along the migrant route in Mexico where hundreds of thousands Central American migrants travel each year with the objective of reaching the US border. Mexico is likewise the world's largest migrant corridor between the Global South and North where organized crime and corrupt police increasingly has taken control. Aided by a feminist methodological framework I reflect on the process of translating the fieldwork into a deeper analysis of the gendered contours of migration control. I likewise discuss the potentials and pitfalls of doing engaged fieldwork in contexts of war and violence and how a feminist departing point could be used in this regard.

WS 26: RETHINKING THE POLITICS OF REFUGEE PROTECTIONStrand Organisers: Stephan Scheel & Martina TazzioliChair: Lorenzo VianelliLocation: Room D328Whom calls law a refugee? Refugee definitions and the politics of denomination.Dana Schmalz (University of Frankfurt)*

“These persons are no actual refugees” is a statement regularly heard in recent months, often used to argue for restrictive border policies. By “actual refugees”, such statements usually mean to refer to the definition of the 1951 Geneva Refugee Convention (GRC). But can we conclusively draw from this definition, who is entitled to protection? How does a more general notion of the refugee relate to its legal definition? And who has a say in challenging the (legal) definition of the refugee? Examining the historical development of refugee definitions in law and comparing provisions in different regional treaties, I will argue that we see a “politics of denomination”. Many states of the Global South have implemented broader definitions of the refugee, which include i.a. flight from indiscriminate violence.² Most states of the Global North, by contrast, have limited the use of the term to the definition offered by the GRC. This identification of the refugee notion with the GRC-definition is deepened by additional rules of protection, which use alternative denominations for those entitled, and often come with a less favorable regime. These patterns in the use of the refugee notion highlight the significance the concept has beyond concrete legal entitlements attached to it. It is my proposition that the “politics of denomination” point to the cosmopolitan brisance involved in the refugee concept, which inside and outside the legal realm serves as a reference term for negotiating rights to access and protection.

Refugees, guests and status decisions: Are they all the same? Rethinking refugee protection in Turkey and the EU.Funda Ustek-Spilda (Goldsmiths, University of London)

The growing number of displaced people seeking refuge in Europe and in Turkey is testing the limits of the international agreements and conventions in place for refugee protection. Even when there are accepted definitions for “asylum seekers”, “refugees” and “internally displaced people”, how these categories are implemented and how protection is allocated differ significantly. Moreover, in the light of current state of affairs, to deal with the number of applications, some countries are coming up with new classifications on their own, and new protection schemes (such as the statusentscheidunge (status decisions) in Austria or guests in Turkey). Accordingly, in this paper I argue that the current refugee crisis is not simply a result of the sheer number of applicants but the inherent problems within the refugee protection system itself. The empirical material for this argument comes from ethnographical fieldwork carried out in Turkey and at international meetings on refugee statistics. EU-level and international organisation reports on the current refugee crisis are also utilised to shed light on the politics of determination of refugee status and protection.

The (non)researched attributes of refugee identity and their role in (un)successful integration.

Kristýna Tamchynová (University of Economics, Prague)

This paper aims to examine, on the specific case study of Syrian refugees in Turkey, whether attributes of the identity used to describe refugees are the same, as those important for the refugees themselves. Based on the common description of refugees as homogeneous group of people who may be threat to us, little attention is paid to their life-stories, their former education, employment and experience. We witness disrespect shown to them, as well as lack of interest in what is really important to them, in comparison with what we think that should be. This is another strain in already complicated process of integration as it reinforces the feeling of estrangement from the majority population. Understanding of how refugees define themselves and, consequently, ability to work with the attributes of identity may be crucial for effectiveness of integration strategies. With this purpose in mind, I give floor to refugees to tell their stories and then use narrative analysis to define the identity attributes on which they focus. I put them in sharp contrast to the existing research suggesting in the end how those attributes may be used to improve integration systems.

To whom should we grant asylum?

Felix Bender (Central European University)

By the end of the year 2015, more than a million people have crosses the borders to the European Union with the goal of seeking refuge. Yet, who has a right to do so? Who ought to be seen as a refugee and who not? In other words: whom should we grant asylum? These are the questions that this paper attempts to answer. I will do so in two steps. First, I will provide a conceptual history of the concept of asylum, outlining the shortcomings of the definition of the refugee as provided by the Geneva Convention of 1951 and the amending Protocol of 1967. I will show how the concept of asylum contains a decisive political meaning, which is not captured by the Convention. Second, I will attempt to show why this widened scope of the concept of asylum deserves normative consideration. I will draw on the work of several scholars such as Lea Ypi, Andrew Shacknove and Jürgen Habermas in arguing that the right to be granted asylum should hinge on the bond between the applicant as a citizen and his state being severed. This, I claim, is not only the case when negative rights of citizens are violated, but also when they are barred from enjoying positive democratic rights. The justification for such a claim lies within the co-originality of negative rights and positive collective freedom. As Habermas states, none can exist without the other, and I contend that the same standard should hold when defending the claim to a widened political concept of asylum.

Traces of dissensus: Resisting immigration raids in London.

Johannes Balthasar Oertli (SOAS, University of London)

Kiri Santer (SOAS, University of London)

Studies of activism have sought to theorize the transnational, interconnected nature of solidarity movements (Juris 2008). Often though, the affective registers within moments of political action are neglected. Whilst considering political action as embedded in a material network of people, places and documents, this article asks what the relation is between the singular moment of dissent and the wider movement of bodies attempting to build resistance to immigration raids in London. It correlates Jacques Rancière's conception of dissensus to manifestations of opposition to immigration raids in London and aims to show that concrete moments of resistance do not simply disappear into the sea of consensus once their materiality has ceased to be. By interweaving the voices of people fighting against immigration raids in London with affect theory, it argues that moments of the political also become part of a different timescale, which precedes and proceeds from their immediacy. The affective registers of 'hope' and 'empowerment' contribute to an understanding of action rooted within the present, but ultimately bound to the project of a bettering of attachments, between subjects whose actions are taken forward on a pre-supposition of equality. It concludes by stating that singular moments of dissent leave affective traces and have the potential to revive the present, disfiguring it on behalf of what it could become: the material difference between being detained or not.

Migration management in Berlin: Emergency centers and struggles against them.

Žiga Podgornik-Jakil (Freie Universität Berlin)

The author of the paper investigates the recent 'migration management' developments in Berlin, Germany, specifically, the sudden proliferation of the so called emergency accommodations (die Notunterkünfte) for the asylum seekers. He deals with the fact, that such collective accommodations are being outsourced by the state to the private actors, from which – or at least should - the latter profit. Through the cooperative empirical investigation with an activist group, which monitors such developments by cooperating with asylum seekers accommodated in mentioned spaces, they find out that such responses are overly dehumanizing, taking away control over asylum seekers' lives. Small collective actions, such as hunger strikes, and networking with activist groups thus contest such social orders. The paper is thus two fold, firstly it deals with the macro-analysis of the political economy of emergency center business model and secondly, through cooperative activist research, it deals with actions and struggles of accommodated asylum seekers against it.

“We are actively integrating ourselves into the struggle”: Detainee activism and the contestation of migration enforcement “from below”.

Leah Montange (University of Toronto)

Immigration detention centers are spaces that immobilize migrant bodies in a space “outside” the imagined nation; they are also spaces where the nation itself is constituted against an Other (the detained migrants). In this presentation, I complicate this understanding of immigration detention centers as spaces of transnational migration management “from above” by conceptualizing the role of hunger strikes in shaping the constitution of borders, citizenship, and border-crossing “from below.” In this talk I narrate an account of the 2014 hunger strikes at the Northwest Detention Center in Tacoma, WA. This series of three hunger strikes was aimed at transforming conditions in the facility and US immigration policy; it gained traction with local and federal political actors, shaping migration management politics at the bodily, local and national scales. I analyze how, through their actions with their bodies, statements, connections with each other, and coordination with media, legal support and organizing outside the detention center, detainees reworked and contributed to ongoing contestations over whose voices can make claims and whose bodies are legitimately inside the United States. It is through these relationships that detainees forged both inside and outside the detention center that they were able to seize a political opening. Ultimately I argue that scholarly conceptions of the geopolitical and biopolitical work that detention centers do must account for the active contestation of citizenship, borders, and (im)mobility by detainees. This paper contributes to our understanding of activism and organizing by migrant detainees, the autonomy of migration, and the role of transnational and non-state actors in managing migration.

Contesting the Dublin Regulation: Refugees claim ‘hereness’ and personhood in Germany.

Fazila Bhimji (University of Central Lancaster)

This study demonstrates how a specific law affects refugees in Germany who first enter the EU through external States such as Italy, Spain, or Hungary. The law is known as the Dublin regulation or Dublin 111. The Dublin regulation only allows refugees to make asylum-claims in the EU country through which they first enter and where they are fingerprinted. The study shows how refugees upon arrival to their preferred State such as Germany negotiate and discover strategies to continue to survive and stay in Germany. The refugees form social networks, learn German, and engage in political actions. Linda Bosniak argues that undocumented immigrants experience diminished personhood because of stringent laws and border controls. This essay argues that the refugees who remain ineligible to claim asylum in Germany struggle to claim personhood and their sense of dignity. This empirical study contributes to scholarship, which has focused on undocumented immigrants' resistance and political actions within Europe by depicting the experiences of refugees directly affected by EU asylum policies. Data are drawn on 18 interviews as well as several informal conversations over a period of eight months from January 2015 to August 2015 in Berlin and Brandenburg, Germany.

School outside these four walls: Contesting irregularization through alternatives to education.

Tanya Aberman (York University)

Philip Ackerman (University of Toronto)

Over the last decade, Canada has witnessed a complete overhaul of its refugee and immigration processes, resulting in the unravelling of a longstanding history of humanitarian contributions. As migrants' situations become increasingly precarious, and pathways for permanent residence are quickly eroded, one area of bordering that has importantly impacted migrant youth involves access to education. While there are a limited number of concessionary policies that promote some level of access at elementary and secondary levels, many youth remain burdened with feelings of being othered, disengaged and illegalized, throughout their educational trajectories. The weight of this exclusion is exacerbated by additional factors including: fear of deportation, non-recognition of home country credentials, negative racialization, feelings of being derailed from their professional path, and other intersections of precarity and dispossession. This paper will explore the processes of irregularisation for precarious status migrant youth, with a particular focus on their point of intersection with Canadian education systems. It will draw attention to emerging contestations against this irregularization through community-driven, humanitarian and activist responses at all levels of education. Particular attention will be paid to the needs-based development of alternatives to education, which provide opportunities for youth to continue on their paths without losing momentum. A few case studies will be highlighted through a Toronto-based organization, the FCJ Refugee Centre, including two free schools for precarious status migrant youth, a participatory research project, and several arts-based, awareness-raising initiatives. These projects are all unique in their capacity to value the diverse social locations of precarious status migrant youth as they attempt to navigate Canadian education systems.

Activism as career of Indonesian return migrant workers.

Akuat Supriyanto (Universidade do Porto, Portugal & Universitas Padjadjaran, Indonesia)

Carlos Cabral-Cardoso (Universidade do Porto, Portugal)

Return migration is an underexplored enclave of migration studies. The literature in this field focus mainly on themes related to motivation to return, the role of remittance, and the significance of the returnees to local development. Previous studies also discuss the orientation of return migrant workers towards entrepreneurship. However, the literature seems to overlook the concept of career as an economic function. Career is described as series of work experiences over time. Axel Honneth (1995) argues that work is both an economic and a moral endeavour. Work is assumed to have normative and emancipatory contents. On the one hand, work has a transcendence capacity to connect with social reality. On the other hand, work plays a significant role in changing society. Consequently, studies on career of returnees must be expanded to accommodate the phenomena of work as moral ‘amplifier’. This study seeks to investigate cases of Indonesian return migrant workers who decided to work as social activists. Data collected by interviews are presented into three biographical narratives and analysed comparatively through the lenses of Honneth’s theory. The adoption of Honneth’s critical approach enables to relate the work and suffering experienced by migrant workers with social activism as career choice. The results suggest that the experience of mistreatment in the workplace deepened returnees’ understanding of the problem of recognition and inequality, and portrays social activism as forms of continued struggle for recognition. In addition, the study attempts to contribute to policy discussion on how to combat inequality in the migrants’ workplace and after they return to their home countries.

“The facts by those who bear them”: Scholarly activism and ‘theory- praxis unity’ in the framework of anthropological migration research.

Sofia Vlachou (Panteion University of Athens, Greece)

Since a few decades, anthropology has been enriched by an infusion with revolutionized, intellectual strands such as critical theory and feminist studies. Those strands clearly contributed to its distancing from positivist, technocratic approaches of further empirically- based social sciences and brought it closer to a commitment of being politically meaningful in the present. Arguably, the study of Migration has long now constituted a prominent field of such commitment instances. However, the shift away from the long- withstanding maxim of “The Anthropologist” as an eternal bohemian and comprehensive outsider, towards the figure of an involved, knowledgeable participant automatically challenges established standards of research reliability and validity and creates a tension between value free- and truthful science. This presentation seeks to critically reflect on the politics of representation by focusing on methodological and ethical aspects of scholarly activism and highlighting its delimitations as it develops during the mingling of the positions of engaged observer, activist participant and bearing subject in the study of Migration. Drawing on the turbulent Greek context, some of the basic questions that are going to be dealt with address the following: What are the usual opportunities of academic researchers’ participation in Migration- related activism? What is the political significance of cultural activism? Is always the mediation of specialists necessary in order to contradict power with truths of the vulnerable? What errands may humanitarian, scholar activists perform among the impulse of direct (re)action to disaster, the will for formational self-achievement and institutional offers for the legation of migration policies? Finally, what can activist anthropologists still grapple with, when grass-roots Migrant and Refugee movements decide to voice themselves directly?

Integration against the will of the state: The struggles of deportable immigrants for regularisation in the UK.

Reinhard Schweitzer (University of Sussex)

With limited success migrant receiving states are trying to reduce the number of foreigners residing irregularly within their borders by either legalising their stay or removing them from their territory. Looking at the UK, this contribution explores the dialectic relationship between this particular set of state policies and individual migrants' own agency in trying to regularise their situation and/or prevent their deportation. Since it is often their local incorporation into various domains of social and economic life that strengthens their fragile position vis-à-vis the state, recent immigration policies increasingly 'illegalise' these integration efforts. Academia therefor has to recognise and better understand irregular migrants' specific agency – as well as its limits – in building, sustaining and employing these links within their immediate social environment.

Living liminality. Ethnological insights on the life situation of non-deportable migrants in Malta.

Sarah Nimführ (University of Vienna)

The majority of rejected asylum seekers in Malta is non-deportable due to a number of legal and practical factors. Non-removed migrants are in legal limbo since they are neither considered as official members of the host country, nor are they deportable or able to leave the country by themselves. In Malta, non-deportable migrants have no formal legal status. This may lead to a permanent situation with limited access to the job market, basic services and health care. Dominant regulations are suspended without prospect of inclusion. This results in a permanent state of emergency. My dissertation focuses on living in "betwixt and between" from a micro-analytical perspective. I raise the question: what impact does the non-implemented removal order have on the living situation of affected persons? How do they cope with everyday life? Which strategies are applied in the area of tension between autonomy and external determination? Following the praxeological approach of the Ethnographic Border Regime Analysis my research links different levels of analysis and examines the interactions of various migration actors. Both subjective experiences and practices of non-deportable migrants and actions as well as perspectives of regulatory institutions of migration are recognised. Based on my ongoing ethnographic research my presentation gives an insight into the agency and vulnerability of non-removable rejected asylum seekers in Malta. I intend to illustrate how intersections of inter alia gender, race and legal status may lead to social marginalisation and poverty. In particular, I explore tactics and strategies that non-removed migrants develop to handle constraints and enhance their well-being in the liminal space.

WS 33: BORDERING PROCESSESStrand Organisers: Jacob Lind & Ioanna TsoniChair: Austin KocherLocation: Room C233Border management, cooperation and control in the Baltic Sea area.Goran Basic (Linnaeus University)Sophia Yakhlef (Lund University)*

Recent events in Europe concerning the large influx of irregular migrants and re-implementation of border controls have drawn our attention towards European migration management and border politics. Border officers claim that they must rely on cooperation to perform their duties of border guarding. In 2014 a collaborative project initiated by the Stockholm County Police, Border Division in Sweden was commenced. The project was partly funded by the European commission. The participants were border police and border authorities in Estonia, Finland, Latvia, Lithuania, and Sweden. This is a qualitative study based on empirically gathered material such as field interviews with border officers and fieldwork observations. This study suggests that the border officers re-negotiate spatial and cultural identities to make cooperation possible creating new distinctions and boundaries of “us and them”. The border officers are united in their views and efforts to protect EU territory and Schengen space from criminal activity but some express ambivalence towards categories of “criminals” concerning irregular migrants. At the same time, cooperation and increased social interaction stimulate the officers to create new categories of “us and them”; those who you know personally trust and those whom you do not know and cannot trust. Earlier distinctions between the east (the former soviet states such as Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia) and the west (Sweden and Finland) are in some ways diminished through interaction and close cooperation. Instead, the Baltic Sea officers create distinctions between themselves and southern European countries regarding work methods, general attitude, opinions, and efficiency.

"Fortress Europe"? The role of Frontex in the European political discourse.Bahar Mahzari (University College Maastricht)

During the last years, NGOs, scholars, and significant parts of civil society have harshly criticized the European Union's (EU) immigration and asylum system. The EU's various agencies working under the Common European Asylum System have been accused of violating principles of international law and securitizing the phenomenon of immigration. Frontex is one of these agencies. The political debate around the common border management agency reached its heights with the shipwreck incident at the coasts of Lampedusa. On the one hand, civil protest against the European immigration policies has never been so rigorous. On the other hand, the Union persistently defends Frontex and its role. However, the reasons put forward in the debate have not been made entirely explicit by the EU. Hence, this paper analyzes EU legislation, speeches, publications and other Union documents in order to shed light on the main arguments. With the tool of Analytical Discourse Evaluation (ADE) it assesses the three most salient arguments consisting of the issues concerning illegal immigration, saving lives and solidarity. Extracting, reconstructing and evaluating these arguments can place the debate around Frontex into a broader framework regarding the Union's legitimacy. Although both, the Saving Lives argument and Solidarity argument can be regarded as strong, all three arguments can be rendered questionable in terms of practical reality: the values promoted by the EU do not mirror the operational reality of Frontex's tasks and missions.

Extra-territorial jurisdiction: critiquing the European Union's complicity with external border control policy on the Moroccan/Spanish frontier.Holly Saunders (Interzone Voices)

This paper considers whether the European Union (EU) exerts extra-territorial jurisdiction, in the form of an external border control policy, in the Kingdom of Morocco. The central question is; whether the EU has 'effective control' over Moroccan security forces, who police irregular migrants on the Moroccan/Spanish border, through the EU/Moroccan Association Agreement and other relevant agreements between the EU and Morocco. If the hypothesis is proven it could mean that, where the enforcement of such policies constitute a breach of international human rights law, such acts are also committed in contravention of the European Convention of Human Rights. If liability is incurred by EU Member States, for the inhumane implementation of external border control policy in third countries, then this could encourage States to support and implement alternative policies whilst condemning inhumane ones.

Europeanisation of families? Marriages of convenience and EU free movement law.Aleksandra Jolkina (Queen Mary, University of London)

The transformation of the EU from an economic to a political community has manifested itself in the introduction of the EU citizenship, as well as creation of a general right to permanent residence for EU citizens and their family members. The 2004 and 2007 enlargements have further contributed to an increase in intra-EU migration. Yet, some Member States have expressed concerns about the 'undesirable consequences' of free movement, pointing to the perceived abuse of rights. In this context, the phenomenon of marriages of convenience is viewed as a significant problem by policy makers, particularly with regard to admission of non-EU family members of (migrant) EU citizens. The CJEU has long recognised the right of Member States to take measures in order to ensure EU freedoms are not exploited in a fraudulent or abusive way. The concept of 'abuse of rights' has equally found its way into Directive 2004/38. Nevertheless, the CJEU has set a very high standard for Member States to establish abuse in the field of free movement of persons, leaving virtually no space for its operation. Marriages of convenience have been regarded as the only exception. Furthermore, in light of the ever growing concerns of Member State governments, the issue of marriages of convenience has become increasingly addressed by EU institutions, which has resulted in a number of legislative measures adopted in recent years. This paper will examine the extent to which the development of the concept of marriages of convenience in EU law reflects the Member States' concerns with regard to the alleged circumvention of national provisions, as well as explore challenges it may create. In particular, the paper will focus on the two recently published legislative acts: Commission Guidance for better transposition and application of Directive 2004/38 (2009) and the Commission Handbook on alleged marriages of convenience between EU citizens and non-EU nationals (2014).

Migrant vulnerability in the inter-American and European human rights systems.Carolina Furusho (University of Kent and University of Hamburg)

Regional human rights courts have addressed certain groups of migrants as vulnerable to increase State accountability for human rights. From a feminist critique to liberal law, the purpose of this paper is to analyze the extent to which the vulnerability assessment carried out by these courts in the context of migration is in consonance with advancing the principle of universality of human rights and achieving a more substantive notion of equality. In order to ensure human rights are equally applied to all, it is imperative that all lives are recognized as equally precarious and thus, equally worthy of protection from avoidable perishing and of provision for flourishing-enabling resources and opportunities. Mindful of the State-endorsed exclusion entailed by immigration and criminal law, I argue that vulnerable migrants such as asylum-seekers and illegal migrants are often placed in a precarious juridical and material situation which aggravates their vulnerability to being victimized in abhorrent ways. Focusing on vulnerability-aggravating factors, a critical assessment further invites an intersectional approach to understanding victimization such as extrajudicial killings, trafficking in human beings, modern slavery and other forms of abuse. Intersectionality sheds a light on how systems of oppressive power, particularly those connected to gender and racial divisions, might contribute to advancing social injustices and human rights violations. Using vulnerability as a multilayered axis to capture intersectional burdens, I will unpack different kinds of vulnerability by breaking down this critique in analytical layers. From this starting point, I will analyze the notion of vulnerability currently being applied by the courts and explore if rather than merely an "attributional" label, a deeper, context-sensitive and more relational version of vulnerability can be seen in the horizon which might tackle structural disadvantages imposed upon vulnerable migrants.

The global politics of human rights: Who cares about Eritrean migrants?Sadia Hassanen (Stockholm University)Hauwa Mahdi (University of Gothenburg)

The statistical flow of emigrants from Eritrea has steadily grown since its independence from Ethiopia in 1993. As of June 2015, UNHCR records 383,869 refugees, from this country of 6 759 999 people at the end of 2015 according to government estimates. This is a micro study of the nature of repression in Eritrea from émigré citizens' perspectives. The political motive for the emigration of Eritreans is well known. This paper will address the political push factors from two angles. Firstly, we will discuss the human rights condition that motivates and drives families and individuals to embark on the risky journey outward. Secondly, we will discuss the global geo-political calculations that blatantly seal Eritreans to their fate, human rights or not. In the latter proposition, we seek to engage the racist politics that undergird global politics guised in colour blindness. Theorising the human rights situation will build on international law and migration institutions, previous academic works in the field and the empirical studies of Eritreans in the migration system. We will also draw from race studies. The exploration of internal political repression draws from interviews with Eritreans who have emigrated since 1993, and are presently spread through four continents. The data has been collected through face-to-face audio-recorded interviews as well as electronically generated (skype) and (blog) materials. The exploration will be pursued with an adapted form of grounded and stand point theories. We engage the messy intersections of human and non-human factors, as well the inherent contradictions in positioning, the fluidity of our abstractions and the stances of institutional actors and the migrants alike.

Emigration from Western Balkan countries – an empirical analysis.Visar Malaj (University of Tirana)Stefano de Rubertis (Università del Salento)

The decision to migrate is a function of push and pull factors. Push factors include social and economic problems in the origin country, such as human rights violation, poverty, war, natural catastrophes etc. On the other hand, migrants are attracted by pull factors in the destination countries, such as high income per capita, common language, security etc. This study is focused on the emigration phenomenon in Western Balkans and on the corresponding determinants. We estimate a particular gravity equation, including two original independent variables, related with two typical concerns for the Western Balkans: corruption and unemployment. According to the diagnostic tests, the estimated model fits well the data. Governments of Western Balkan countries should orient their policies toward the mitigation of social and economic inequality, the elimination of corruption and of the culture of impunity, and the creation of new jobs. This will lead to a sustainable economic growth and to the reduction of the number of reasons to leave the country. Authorities should implement drastic reforms and concrete measures, based on high quality studies and on successful models of former communist countries, in order to come out of the long and dark tunnel of transition.

Employment by labour market intermediaries: Prospects and problems.Johanna Schenner (University of Vienna)

The literature on migration and development has been dominated by debates about discursive shifts in analysing the nexus between the two (De Haas, 2008), concern about migrants' agency (Skeldon, 2008), push and pull factors (Castles, de Haas and Miller, 2014), and rural exodus / urbanization (Yap, 1976; Gilbert and Gugler, 1982). Since the 1990's international labour migration began to grow rapidly. Since 2008 international labour migration has grown less rapidly, but does continue to grow. The decline in the rate of growth in labour migration may be explained by the repercussions of the 2008 financial crisis. Today the scale of international labour migration reached new record levels (Andrees, Nasri and Swiniarski, 2015). Parallel to the rise in international labour migration LMIs have proliferated. The proliferation of LMIs can be traced back to the International Labour Organisation's (ILO) green light in 1997 on the establishment of LMIs as legal economic actors (Peck, Theodore and Ward, 2005). Since 1997 'legal' LMIs have developed in various ways (Enright, 2013) while previous forms of labour market intermediation that had disappeared (or had been illegal, informal or hidden), such as gangmaster, reemerged (Strauss, 2013). In the literature on migration and development very little attention has been paid to the role of labour market intermediaries (LMIs) in facilitating migration and development which is problematic at best. This paper seeks first to retrace the development of LMIs. The second part explores how LMIs are related to international labour migration and, by taking the example of UK horticulture, how LMIs may exploit labour migrants' vulnerabilities. The final part of this paper explores the challenges to regulating recruitment by LMIs in global supply chains; by reviewing how recruitment works, why regulating recruitment tends to fail; and the extent to which subcontracting is a key structural factor in today's recruitment market.

Criminalised labour, criminalised life? Excesses and contradictions in sanctions against undocumented migrant workers.Niklas Selberg (Lund University)

The exploitation and subordination of undocumented migrant workers are largely the result of the law locating such individuals outside of its realms. However, to some extent it is also the result of explicit legal regulation; according to Swedish law it is a crime (20 kap. 3 § utlänningslagen [2005:716]) to take a job while being ‘undocumented’. At the same time, a particular protective piece of legislation is relevant for this group of workers. This means that a person of a certain status is subjected to both repression and protection on part of Swedish law. This paper develops a position from which the criminalisation of circulating labor can be criticized. Drawing from the notion of labor as something inalienable from its human bearer, the paper argues for the abolishing of criminal sanctions against undocumented migrants’ labor market participation. The analysis of protection and repression against undocumented migrant workers is done against the backdrop of undocumented migrants as simultaneously human rights bearers and “illegals”, from the perspective of the host state. The theoretical framework is not only the coherence of the legal system but also a critical perspective founded in the notion of labor power as inseparable from the human. Legally speaking the paper discusses Swedish law, EU-law, instruments of the Council of Europe and also international labor law discourse (i.e. ILO-instruments).

WS 35: POSTCOLONIAL AND INTERSECTIONAL PERSPECTIVESStrand Organisers: Vanna Nordling & Maja SagerChair: Heidi MoksnesLocation: Room D222Discursive debate on Iranian LGBTQs’ right in the European media.Zeynab Alsadat Peyghambarzadeh (Spectrum)*

LGBTQ rights in Iran have been a popular topic of discussion in Western media in the recent years. While Western politicians, social activists and media, are expressing their anxiety about violation of human rights of LGBTQs in Iran, government of Iran, like many other non-western governments, claims that engaging in same sex sexual conduct is a Western life style. In this challenge between Iran and West, some Iranian LGBTQs find no alternative but to seek asylum in the Western countries and sometimes apply for Western grants for LGBTQ rights awareness projects. Consequently, the idea that same sex sexual conduct is a Western culture is reinforced. On the other hand, the security that some of them may enjoy in the Western countries can enable them to claim belonging to a national Iranian, an ethnical or Islamic identity, proving that LGBTQs can come from any country including Iran. The hegemonic dominant discourses among Iranian LGBTQs defines sexual orientation and even sometimes gender essentially and justify homosexuality and transsexuality as the ways that some people have been born and cannot change it. In this dichotomist view, people can be either a man or a woman who essentially can fall in love with a person from same sex or opposite sex. From a Foucaultian view point, this paper will focus on the discursive debate on Iranian LGBTQs’ right in the European media, after the Ahmadinejad presidency (2005-2013) who became famous as an anti gay politician by denying existences of homosexuals in Iran. I want to see how different colonialist, nationalist, and neo-conservative discourses around same sex sexual conducts, and also LGBTQ's discourses of resistance against those discourses, emerged, developed and affected on each other.

Being "the other other" –Racialised LGBTQ-people and European migration.

Katharina Kehl (University of Gothenburg)

Racialised notions of gender and sexuality have a long history of being used to distinguish between acceptable and unacceptable ways of being European, and being in- or outside Europe. In current debates around migration in Western-European societies, sexual rights and the emancipation of women and LGBTQ-people have taken centre stage in this discussion. They are being used to frame Europe in a global context as a place of progress, tolerance, openness and individual liberties. While historically homosexuals have been the cultural Other in Western societies, they are now increasingly incorporated into mainstream politics as a marker against the non-Western (often Islamic) Other of migrant communities. This European brand of "homonationalism" is at work in a geographical space that experiences and projects itself as increasingly post-national, but whose internal coherence and external boundaries are at the same time constructed along cultural values. Within these discourses, racialised LGBTQ-people, particularly those who are migrants, are painted frequently as faceless victims of oppression, or as "notable exceptions" (having emancipated themselves "their" oppressive cultural background), not as political subjects. This can make participation in the political debate extremely difficult – it means taking sides in an imaginary "clash of cultures", with the expectation to either denounce one's migrant background or not to be taken serious within the public debate. This paper explores the ways in which not only state institutions and mainstream media, but more importantly LGBTQ/women's rights organisations have perpetuated dominant themes on migrants and sexual rights, and what that might mean for activists and researchers alike.

Victimisation, xenophobia and welfare chauvinism in Scandinavia: The case of Norway.

Mette Wiggen (University of Leeds)

This paper will explore how the far right and the mainstream in Scandinavia have for decades promoted a neo liberal and welfare chauvinistic agenda. In European welfare states there has since the 1990s been a strong populist backlash against 'non deserving' immigrants, especially Muslims. Muslim women are particularly victimised and the far right is using a peculiar mix of xenophobia and racism in claiming to challenge sexism and immigrant 'culture'. Xenophobic discourse is the norm across Europe, where the main political concern during the current humanitarian crisis seems to lie with culture and the cost of welfare and humanitarian aid. Scandinavia is no exception and the European Commission against Racism and Intolerance has long been concerned about racism in Norway, and the European Commission has deemed the Norwegian media guilty of criticising, stereotyping and generalising in reports on Muslim immigrants in particular. Increase in inequality and poverty, privatisation of the welfare state, cut backs, welfare chauvinism and negative reporting of issues involving immigrants is the new normal in Norway where a coalition of the far right and the mainstream right has been in government since 2013. Privatisation of the media has also helped obscure privatisation of the health sector, and is drowning critical voices. Norway tops the UN human development index whilst an increasing proportion of the population is excluded from the welfare state and the wealth of the country. This paper reflects on the recent trend in Scandinavia and Norway in particular and raises the question of whose lives matter in a post social democratic Scandinavia.

Sámi feminisms – Nation, self-determination and decolonization.Ina Knoblock (Lund University)

Sámi feminisms has identified the complex ways through which colonialism and racism have shaped and continue to shape gender relations within the Sámi community, as well as the experiences and specific positions of Indigenous women in the Nordic countries today. Taking the narratives of Sámi women activists as its point of departure the paper focuses on Sámi women's struggles for survival, self-determination and decolonization. A central theme evolving from women's narratives is the need for Indigenous nation-building and the strengthening of Indigenous communities and societies. The paper concludes by exploring some implications of Sámi and Indigenous feminisms for feminist analysis, particularly in relation to issues of nation, belonging and boundaries.

A journalistic space of contestation: The crime myth of Sweden's Chicago.Leandro Schclarek Mulinari (Stockholm University)

Exploring the relevance of the city as a space where images of crime are developed and challenged, this qualitative study discusses why established journalists dispute the crime image of Malmö, Sweden's third largest city. According to the informants Malmö is used as a code word to criticize notions of the multicultural society. Thus, it has become a space of contestation. Departing from an understanding of racism as a structural attribute of the media, the analysis points to the need of understanding the intimate relationship between media and crime image in the intersection of two phenomena: on the one hand race as a conflict line in contemporary society, and on the other hand the neoliberal transformation of cities.

WS 36: RETHINKING THE POLITICS OF REFUGEE PROTECTIONStrand Organisers: Vanna Nordling & Emma SagerChair: Funda UstekLocation: Room D328Protection despite Dublin.David Lorenz (Institute for Social Research Frankfurt am Main)*

The Dublin Regulation, designed to distribute the responsibility of processing asylum applications between the member states, constitutes a corner stone of the Common European Asylum System. Studying the implementation of the Dublin Regulation from the perspective of a materialistic theory of the state, that conceptualises state politics as outcomes of social struggles for hegemony, promises to grant some important insights into current politics of refugee protection: 1. Member states rather perceive their responsibility for asylum claims as a burden, which they try to pass on to one another. 2. Far from aiming primarily at the protection of refugees, Dublin is designed to create incentives for a closure of the external border of the EU. 3. The Crisis of Dublin is mainly the result of resistance of refugees in combination with the refusal of many member states to implement the regulation thoroughly.

Tracing UNHCR's transformation into an agency of forced migration management through the emergence of new figures of protection.

Philipp Ratfisch (Institute for Migration Research and Intercultural Studies, University of Osnabrueck)

Stephan Scheel (Goldsmiths, University of London)

Numerous commentators have noted that UNHCR's mandate and field of activities underwent a major change after the end of the Cold war, highlighting the predominance of the interests of Western states in the refugee protection regime. What has not been acknowledged so far is the role that the emergence of new figures of protection – labels used to categorise certain groups of people – has played in this transformation process. Drawing on the works of STS-scholars John Law and Ian Hacking, we refine the concept of figures of migration (Rigo & Karakayali 2010) to show that new figures of protection do not just reflect transformations in relations of (forced) migration, but also help to bring these transformations about. The reason is that figures of protection do not just describe groups of people on the move but rather help to bring them into being as intelligible matters of concern that require a response by (and transformation of) the refugee protection regime. This performative quality of figures of protection resides in their double social life: Figures of protection are of the social because they only become virulent if they have certain advocates who promote them. And they are of the social because they help to constitute and organise the social: they don't just represent a reality out there, but bring social realities into being in particular ways. We use the emergence of the figures of 'irregular secondary mover' (ISM) and the 'internally displaced person' (IDP) to illustrate this double social life of figures of protection and to trace UNHCR's transformation from an agency of refugee protection towards an agency of forced migration management at the service of Western states seeking to contain the world's non-insured.

A journey towards protection: Syrian refugees between war and borders.

Maissaa Almustafa (Balsillie School of International Affairs)

Since 2011, Syrians have made some 900 thousand asylum applications to the EU. Refugees, who have escaped the brutal war in Syria, have found themselves trapped between border controls designed to regulate refugee mobility and an international protection system that has failed to offer resettlement. Both regimes have forced those who are desperate to secure safety and new life, to undertake precarious journeys for Northern Europe where they believe they will find better protection and acceptance. However, with restrictive European visa systems and border control, desperate Syrians have been left with no legal routes, but for the undertaking of fatal journeys through Aegean and Mediterranean Seas. Against this context, I explore this complex journey of vulnerability and resistance. I situate refugees at the center of my work with a particular focus on their agency when they are confronted with border controls and a failing protection regime. Informed by original field research based on interviews and personal knowledge of the journeys that Syrians have made and are making, my paper examines the conditions that forced Syrians into this journey, which is an 'act of escape' (Mezzadra 2015) and an access to citizenship but also a process of identity transformation and reconstruction.

International human rights treaties versus bilateral agreements: Implications for refugees and illegalized immigrants.

Hallee Caron (University of California, Irvine)

As the number of refugees recognized by the UN's High Commissioner on Refugees swelled to over 50 million in 2015, governments around the world have taken various approaches to addressing what could only be called “a refugee crisis.” This paper explores how international human rights law concerning treatment of refugees can be at odds with bilateral agreements such as the 1992 readmission agreement between Spain and Morocco. The readmission agreement, which went into effect in 2012, requires Morocco to re-admit illegal migrants in Spain who traveled via Morocco. While there is a legal exception for refugees within the agreement, refugee status is rarely afforded to people who are otherwise considered illegal migrants begging the questions: What are the consequences for the people who fall through the gaps in this definition? What about the “stranded migrants” who spend months and sometimes years in “transit countries”? Tracing the ever-evolving flow of illegalized migration through West Africa and Spain to Europe over the last sixty years, I find restrictive immigration policies have moved illegal migration westward. Where Morocco was once a major source of emigration, it has become a transit country where some Sub-Saharan Africans fleeing extreme poverty and violence are becoming stranded.

Refugees’ protection and refugees’ mobility, an irremediable oxymoron?

Scalettaris Giulia (University of Lille)

My PhD work examines the unfolding of an innovative project launched by the UNHCR in 2003 that aimed at blending mobility into the three “traditional solutions” to the “refugee problem”. This project considered the mobility of Afghans – one of the world largest refugee populations - as an irreversible phenomenon and as a social and economic resource. The constraints that this project faced during its implementation led me to acknowledge the state-centred and ultimately sedentary worldview that underpins refugee policies. Subsequent research among Afghan asylum seekers in Europe allowed me to examine the constraints faced by asylum seekers on the move when confronted to the Dublin system (that establishes the EU Member State responsible for examining their asylum applications) as well as the strategies developed by Afghans to cope with it. Based on these two researches, this paper reflects on the relationship between refugee protection and refugee mobility, highlighting inter alia the conundrum it rises and the limits of the international refugee regime that it reveals.

4Stelle Hotel is a web documentary that recounts a day in the life of the multiethnic community that occupied the abandoned luxury hotel on Via Prenestina in Rome and transformed it into their own home. For years Italy has found itself under the international spotlight due to the massive influx of immigrants, who are often forced to live isolated from our society and are denied fundamental rights. 4Stelle Hotel documents a real response to this critical situation, with the story of self-organised community that has created a unique social experiment: living together whilst overcoming cultural and linguistic differences. The Eurostars Roma Congress Hotel and Convention Center, a modern four-star hotel almost a kilometre from Rome's ring road (Grande Raccordo Anulare) on the eastern periphery of the city, closed unexpectedly in December 2011, laying off 60 workers. The structure is part of the international luxury chain Eurostars, which owns more than 50 hotels worldwide, predominantly orientated towards a business clientele. The imposing glass structure remained abandoned for almost a year, until it became occupied by 200 migrant families, led by the BPM collective (Blocchi Precari Metropolitani), one of the most well-known movements tackling the housing crisis in the capital. The occupation is part of a wave of activism that took place on 6 December 2012, bringing around 3,000 people living in a housing emergency into dozens of unsold or unused buildings to shouts of 'let's take back the city'. 4Stelle Hotel is inhabited by around 500 people, comprising 30 different nationalities, who predominantly come from the Maghreb, the Horn of Africa, Latin America, Eastern Europe and Sub-Saharan Africa. They have been able to revitalise the hotel through shared re-activation of the rooms and communal spaces, according to a process of internal self-organisation, including cleaning rotas and picket lines. Some of the occupants have lived in Italy for years, others have escaped from regimes, revolution and extreme poverty. All of them claim with dignity their right to a home and a better future. 4Stelle Hotel is the story of this multi-ethnic apartment building, which is fighting for a brighter future, under constant threat of eviction by the authorities. The home, in fact, is not only a shelter: it is a right to be claimed and defended.

Irregular migrants on the labor market: Networks for information and protection.

Heidi Moksnes (Stockholm University)

Irregular migrants, along with other labor migrants, are becoming part of the growing bottom levels of the domestic labor force in Sweden as elsewhere, working for salaries far below regular national rates and with minimal conditions of security. In the global competition for lower costs for production and service, they constitute an attractive option for many employers. In line with the EU Directive of 2009, the Swedish parliament made legal changes in 2013 that, while giving employers increased penalties for employing workers without permits, assure undocumented workers access to certain labor rights, such as a salary in accordance with common standards for the job in question. However, the chances for undocumented workers to find unions to actively mobilize to support demands based on these new laws are scant, in Sweden as in many other countries. As undocumented, they are not part of the work force that Swedish unions target – although some unions have attempted to create specialized arenas for undocumented workers – and their acceptance of substandard salaries are commonly regarded as a threat against the nationally established levels. However, irregular migrants sometimes find significant tools against extreme levels of exploitation by employers through their own networks in the country; networks among people from their home region, speaking the same language. Such networks can provide not only contacts with employers who speak one's language – in itself no protection against abuse – but also knowledge of Swedish standard levels of salary, of the salaries other undocumented have received, and sometimes of ways to protect oneself against the most blatant forms of abuse. Based on my anthropological fieldwork among and interviews with irregular migrants from Latin America, working and living in the Stockholm region, I will discuss how their extensive networks offer one of the explanations why they receive higher salaries than many other irregular workers.

Wanted – A discourse analysis of seven migrants' experiences of working without a permit in Sweden.

Johanna Övling (The Museum of Work)

My master thesis Wanted (Efterlyst och eftertraktad, 2015) examines seven migrants' experiences of working and living in Sweden without a work- or residency permit. Undocumented migrants in Sweden lack the citizens' social, economic and political security. Simultaneously, they are considered to be a desirable working force in the labor market. The study is based on interviews with seven migrants and examines the discourses of the non-citizenship that are articulated in their stories. More precisely, I have paid attention to how the informants navigate within, and negotiate with, the discourses. The study shows, among other things, that the informants are positioned as helpless, hidden and exploited within a “victim discourse”, and as a potential criminal and passive threat within a national discourse. On the other hand, working experience also seems to be a possible articulation of resistance against the above-mentioned subject positions, as it enables the informants to position themselves as active, moral and capable.

Chinese migrant sex workers mobilization in Paris. From invisibility to collective action.

Hélène Le Bail (CERI Sciences Po Paris)

Almost invisible in the Parisian urban landscape a few years ago, the Chinese sex workers have attracted lots of attention since 2013 with their involvement in the recent demonstrations against a new bill on sex work. Since then, the Chinese women, mostly irregular residents, have been invited by elected representatives on local and national level to discuss issues of public security and potential impact on sex workers of the clients' penalisation on sex workers. They finally created a sex worker collective at the end of 2014. To explain the rallying of highly stigmatized and precarious migrant women, three factors can be analysed. First, even if most of them migrated out of kinship networks, they share a common experience of multi-layered stigmatization (due to their activity, their administrative status) from the host society, the rest of the Chinese community and the institutions (primarily police harassment). Secondly, they have the support of a well-established NGO which mobilized practical, political and media resources for them. Thirdly, their mobilization took place in a period of legislative reform and of larger mobilization among sex workers' groups, it was a window of opportunity. My presentation is based on a three year (2013-2015) participant observation method fieldwork with the supportive NGO, the Chinese sex worker collective, during demonstrations against the bill and meetings with elected representatives and local residents. I also collected flyers, speeches and open-ended interviews with the NGO members and the sex worker collective's members. I propose a chronological description of the mobilization process to underline the gap between political discourses pertaining to help migrant sex workers and elected representatives' difficulty to accept these sex workers as credible interlocutors and local citizens. It shows how the empowerment of presumed victims resulted in additional suspicion and stigmatisation.

Trade Union centers for undocumented migrant workers in Germany and Austria as results of migratory struggles.

Michel Jungwirth (University of Vienna)

Holger Wilcke (Humboldt University)

In the past, Trade Unions in Germany and Austria often held restrictive positions in regard to immigration and foreign labor. Their position seemed to change by the emergence of Trade Union centers for undocumented migrant workers in both countries. In public discourse these centers are recognized as a progressive achievement and union innovation, the direct result of a controversy concerning the trade unions strategy on undocumented labor migration. However, we will show that the establishment of these centers can not be conceived without acknowledging the role of migratory and anti-racist struggles. Illegalized workers in particular – organized in the campaign of the Society for Legalization (Gesellschaft für Legalisierung) – forced the German trade union ver.di to discuss the possibility of becoming members without legally defined status. Their intervention in the union congress was successful, resulting in the Working Group for Undocumented Labor, which led to the 2009 formation of the Center for Undocumented Migrant Workers in Berlin. Following the German example, Trade Unions in Austria also introduced an advice center for undocumented workers (UNDOK-Anlaufstelle). While the center has benefited from political backing, its emergence is due to the efforts of activists, migrant organizations their cooperation with individual trade unionists. This effort to defend undocumented migrant workers from exploitation is in stark contrast to the established strategy of attacking and reporting those employing illegalized migrants, mostly regardless of the consequences for this group. Migratory and anti-racist struggle in Germany and Austria are a necessity for these centers but have been frequently silenced and obscured. Even though these support structures are still disputed in the unions themselves, they are the necessary first step in order to improve working conditions for illegalized migrants and their relations to Trade Unions.

Representing immigrant workers or immigrant residents? Studying the legitimacy dilemma of an immigrant organization in Los Angeles.

Davide Gnes (University of Amsterdam)

In this paper I argue that immigrant political organizations are constantly facing legitimacy dilemmas in the context in which they operate. Organizational responses to such dilemmas not only shape organizational narratives and practices, but also the relation between the organization and their immigrant membership and constituency. Building on theories of organizational legitimacy, I plan to analyze the trajectory of the Koreatown Immigrant Workers Alliance (KIWA), an immigrant-led advocacy organization located in Los Angeles, California. Through the study of the organization's internal archives and through interviews with current and former staff, I outline KIWA's transition from a quasi-labor union to a community-based organization as it took place in the mid-2000s. In the wake of a major campaign failure in 2003, which sparked a period of heated internal discussion but also nearly bankrupted the organization, KIWA decided to change the bases of its legitimacy, both at the discursive level – moving away from contentious politics to embrace institutional politics – and at the material level – shifting from the support of activists and volunteers to that of professional advocacy organizations and philanthropic foundations. In describing the legitimating dilemma as experienced by its main protagonists, I seek to shed light on two different processes, largely neglected by the literature on legitimacy: how internal power dynamics affect organizational decision-making, particularly when external shocks unfold; and how imperatives of survival may drive organizations away from the original mission and purposes for which they were established.

"Solidarity without borders: Gramscian perspectives on migration and civil society alliances".

Martin Bak Jörgensen (Aalborg University)

Susi Meret (Aalborg University)

'Solidarity without Borders' examines the politics of migration at the ground-level, considering migrants not as an issue to be solved but as individual political agents, exploring the possibilities raised by alliances between migrants and trade unions, worker organizations, and other constituencies. Applying Gramsci's theories of modern resistance and taking up the Gezi Park Protests in Turkey, social movements in Ireland, and the Lampedusan Libyan migrant group as case studies, Solidarity without Borders demonstrates how new solidarity relations are shaped and how these may construct a new common ground for developing political alternatives.

Articulations of racialisation and the continuum of deportability. Migration political changes in Sweden 2015/2016.

Maja Sager (Lund University)

Klara Öberg (University of Gothenburg)

During 2015 the struggles of people who searched to enter and move across Europe became increasingly intense with unthinkable numbers of deaths on the sea and other dangerous parts of the various alternative routes to and across Europe. Initially Europe witnessed a popular mobilisation of solidarity and demands for a humane response articulated through government officials as well as in the media. However, the government responses changed rapidly and were replaced by a narrative of crisis and a steering towards harsher regulations and closed borders aiming to limit the numbers of asylum seekers. In Sweden, following the construction of a narrative of crisis the Social democratic/Green party government and the right wing parties launched an initial migration political agreement in October 2015 – “Insatser med anledning av flyktingkrisen” (“Interventions regarding the refugee crisis”) and on November 25, 2015, the government launched further interventions. These interventions imply a critical shift in the Swedish migration and asylum regulations and we argue that shift to visibly and bluntly enforcing the links between migration politics and labour politics. In other words: to abandon a human rights perspective. In this paper our analysis focuses on the Swedish migration politics’ switching from permanent to temporary residence permits and the racialisation of service and domestic work low pay sectors. We explore how a racialised and gendered continuum of deportability is constructed, experienced and contested in the context of these government responses to present migrations. The analysis builds on two kinds of material: government documents and press releases regarding the migration political interventions, and ethnographic material from two different studies exploring structures and experiences of irregularity in the Swedish context (Sager 2011, Öberg 2015).

Irregularisation of migrants and informalisation of work from a Swedish perspective.

Anders Neergaard (REMESO, Linköping University)

Increased migration and the international restructuring of production are two trends often mentioned as concrete examples of globalisation. In this paper the aim is to link these phenomenon by focussing on citizenship and irregularisation of migrants on the one hand, and precariousness and informalisation of labour on the other. The theoretical link in combining partially autonomous processes will be racialisation. An example here is the classic utterance of the social democratic minister: ‘We need a growing service sector. Not least, I’m thinking of those who come here as refugees and who can make bread, sew, care for children and clean. They shall have an outlet for their skills and also get paid for it’ (Jens Orback, DN 31/10 2004). Thus the aim of the paper is to analyse governance and discourses producing irregularisation and informalisation through processes of racialisation. The focus will be on an analysis of Sweden both in relation to the irregularisation of migrants and informalisation of work. The paper starts out with a theoretical discussion of the citizenship-irregularisation of migrant, the precariousness-informalisation of labour nexus and then continues to how they theoretically can be captured by racialisation. Thereafter follows an analysis of recent changes in governance (mainly legislation and collective agreements and the discourses they represent) concerning both migration characterised by fragmentation and irregularisation, and labour characterised by segmentation and informalisation. The material for the study is based on documents arguing government, employer associations and trade union positions, as well as supplemented with a few interviews and secondary literature.

Irregular migrant domestic workers in Hong Kong SAR.

Gabriela Marti (SOAS, University of London)

The Hong Kong Special Administrative Region of the People’s Republic of China (Hong Kong) is a major destination for migrant domestic workers (MDWs) from a number of states in Asia, especially the Philippines and Indonesia. Over 320,000 MDWs are currently employed in private households, in Hong Kong. MDWs are admitted to Hong Kong based on temporary, two-year employment contracts, and as migrants, they are subject to a number of strict immigration regulations (notably the “New Conditions of Stay” of 1987). MDWs are required to live in with their employers, and upon termination of their employment, they are only permitted to stay in Hong Kong for the remainder of the duration of their work visa or for two weeks, whichever is shorter (“two-week rule”). While most MDWs in Hong Kong are regular migrants, some are in an irregular status, for instance since they have overstayed their visa (that is, they have entered the host jurisdiction lawfully but have stayed for a longer period than the duration of their visa and/or have breached the two-week rule). Drawing on fieldwork conducted in 2014 and 2015 in Hong Kong (notably interviews with representatives of MDWs’ organisations and NGOs providing services to MDWs), this paper explores the legal status of irregular MDWs in Hong Kong, their higher degree of vulnerability to exploitation by employers, and the difficulties they encounter in accessing health care, education, and migrants’ associations in the Special Administrative Region.

Making workers illegal sojourners: The case of France.

Caroline Caplan (Université Paris Descartes)

Dumitru Speranta (Université Paris Descartes)

This paper builds on the literature on illegalization (Bauder 2014; Dauvergne 2008; McDonald 2009) to analyze the processes through which France’s legislation concerning the right to work is construed to reduce the rights to reside. The choice of France as a case study is justified by its mass production of illegality. According to the Eurostat figures for 2014, France is the first EU country by the number of third-country nationals ordered to leave and the second by the number of people “found illegally present”. The phrase “found to be illegally present” refers to people who are “officially found to be on the territory of a Member State and who do not fulfil, or no longer fulfil, the conditions for stay or residence” (Regulation EC 862/2007). Therefore, we interpret the number of people “found to be illegally present” as illustrating the amount of effort performed by the legislative and administrative bodies (police, prefecture, labor administration etc.) to make people illegal. The case of France is remarkable insofar as in 2014, France accounted for 20% of all the administrative work performed in the EU to found people illegally present. In this paper, the analysis is limited to the legal provisions concerning employment. We argue that workers are put at risk of being illegalized through three main processes. The intensive legislative activity results in (i) a proliferation of the kinds of resident permits, each one associated to specific working rights; (ii) a restrained access to both (full-time) employment and to the possibility of changing one’s kind of permit; (iii) withdrawal of the resident permit in case of violation of labor law. The paper describes both the legislative activity and the efforts performed by the administrative bodies to enforce the rich legislation.

The role of migrant agency in the processes of political socialization: the case of the Turkish student return migrants from Germany.

Seda Aydin (Universitat Autònoma de Barcelona)

The increasing scholarly interest in political and social remittances and migrant political socialization reveals that the literature tends to consider the migrants as passive receivers of the political and social context in their host countries, absorbing the first-world values and communicating them to their third-world home countries. As a response to this tendency, this study focuses on the dynamics of the migrant agency in the processes of political socialization. It addresses two gaps in the literature: the common neglect of the processual dimension of migrant political socialization and the consequent disregard of the migrant agency in the political socialization processes. I use the grounded theory methodology and analyze the case of the political socialization of the Turkish student return migrants from Germany (The expression “Turkish return migrant” includes all ethnicities in Turkey). I base my analysis on the hypothesis that migrants are not passive receivers of political socialization, rather they may negotiate, reject, or selectively appropriate the socialization process. My aim is to study the dynamics of political socialization as a basic social process (Glaser and Strauss 1967) and locate the migrant agency within it. In my research, the narratives of the interviewees reveal a basic social process of negative political socialization, by which I refer to the migrants’ socialization to the outsiders’ position of a political system they do not necessarily support. I also discover two core categories, empathy and rationalism, that play a role in both conventional and negative political socialization of the student migrants. Habitual, projective and practical evaluative elements of migrant agency (Emirbayer and Mische 1998) are at work in the constitution of these core categories and the unfolding of negative and conventional political socialization.

Imagining the other: the symbolic construction of ‘illegal migrants’ among documented Mexican migrants in Sweden.

Guillermo Merele (University of Auckland)

Drawing upon 46 interviews with Mexican migrants in Sweden this paper focuses on the different ways in which documented migrants construct culturally mediated imaginaries of ‘illegal migration’. Using a semiotic approach it explores the influence of culturally rooted discourses in the creation of an image of the self and how this affects the perceptions held over specific migrant groups. A typology is constructed revealing the interplay five symbolic constructions over which members of the Mexican community in Malmo and Stockholm develop feelings of empathy, solidarity, neutrality, resistance and resentment towards asylum seekers and refugees. The paper concludes that symbolic representations of migration are relevant to understand the types of support and opposition that irregular migrants can obtain from other migrant groups.

The border and partitioned identities.

Animesh Baidya (Jadavpur University)

The partition of India and consequently the Bangladesh liberation war and the immigration of inhabitants from East Bengal to West Bengal have long been discussed in a plethora of different socio-anthological compendium till 1971. The event of immigration has remained superfluous prevalently in the border areas of West Bengal till today. But surprisingly the struggle for survival of these homeless people who migrated after 1971 has been little discussed. There remains a stark difference between the perceptions of identity and the insecurity of refugees who left Bangladesh before 1971 compared to those who left – and continue to do so - in later periods. This paper is an attempt to narrate the story of an individual who left Bangladesh as an expatriate and came to India in 1990s at a very young age, mapping the formation of an identity in this in-between context. The essay is presented mostly in the form of an interview with the respondent along with little excerpts from his own diary. The narrative explores the conceptual dilemmas about community, nationality, manifestations of ‘nationalism’, like the national flag and anthem, acting in the tandem with the experience of vulnerability, enculturation, socialization and the illegitimacy of living as ‘resident alien’ in a country away from his motherland. I attempt to focus on ethnocentric duality, the intractable border meeting the unarticulated reality of existence ‘across’ rather than ‘within’. As there is no as such written document regarding this issue, I think this oral and ‘Unofficial’ personal narrative can open a new avenue in the context of migration and refugee studies. The aim is to extend Border Studies to bring these unarticulated realities upon the agenda of consideration, especially with respect to the subcontinent, and thereby chart a somewhat different path from that which is delineated by ‘national border’ ideologies.

A posthumanist microethnography of multicultural – Olfactory assemblages in Rome’s Banglatown.

Elisa Fiore (Utrecht University)

The present article draws from a wider research project conducted in the months of February and May 2015 in Tor Pignattara, one of the twelve urban zones constituting the V Municipality of the city of Rome. The project, which takes the shape of a multisensory, posthumanist microethnography of multicultural, mainly attempts to investigate how affective urban materialities are capable to organize and co-participate in the iterative reconfigurings of everyday experience with/in the locale. In particular, it looks at how material social practices such as racialization, gendering and classing intra-act (Barad 2007) in the production of constitutive in/exclusion(s) with/in it. After a brief introduction about the context of the research and the process of gendered racialization by which it is currently invested, this article proposes feminist new materialism as a theoretico-methodological framework that counters the epistemological identity politics responsible for the essentialization and reification of constituencies in the locale. By conceiving identity structurations as more-than-human assemblages given by the intra-action of human and nonhuman actants, feminist materialism challenges their assumed discreteness and poses them as co-constitutive, dynamic and overlapping historical formations rather than as pre-existing givens. In fact, it accounts for the enactment of the nonhuman in the materialization of what there is. This article proposes a feminist new materialist reading of food and kitchen odors in Tor Pignattara as a tool to denounce the arbitrariness of the dichotomous thinking that structures life in late western modernity.

This paper aims to present the outcomes of ethnographical research in various refugee camps in Poland. Both of us have entered the field multiple times in different refuges. Trying to leave the routes of arrival and personal stories of refugees, we are focusing on the space that have no notion of place (e.g. Tuan, 1977 [in:] Cresweell, 2004) and which is almost fully constructed by the authorities. By using the opposition between 'home' and institution, we asked ourselves: Is it possible to call a place, where there is almost no personally arranged space and the facility is practically completely fulfilling minimal needs of refugees, a 'home'? By examining different camp types – from the reception and the detention camps to camp devoted only for children and women – we show how arrival to a European Union country is not the end of the road, but still keeps refugees in transition mode. Following the recent work of E. C. Dunn (2014) we point out at the 'nothingness' which the asylum seekers experience and in which they find themselves to be. (...) By observing the way people deal with the overwhelming institutionalisation of everyday life we found traces of the domestication processes and refugees agency in creation of space in strongly hierarchical environment. The power relations in the field cannot be brought to simple division between the Office for Foreigners and the camp inhabitants. The divisions are empowered by a outsourcing management of camps and the highly gendered relations between inhabitants and staff. In presentation this we discuss some of the aspects of those relations, like: abuses of the privacy and the right to decide about ones actions, independence of the asylum seekers, differently understood 'safety' (depending on a type of a camp), the division dirt/purity, which we found essential to understand social and institutional world of refugee camps in Poland.

Degrees of "Europeanness" on the Aegean Turkish-Greek border.Aila Spathopoulou (Kings College University London)

In this paper, I use the 'ship' as an empirical and conceptual tool to illustrate the materiality that is attached to specific meanings and experiences of "Europeanness" and "Europeanization" on the Aegean Turkish-Greek border, in relation to the patterns of mobility that have developed on its waters by the undocumented migrants. Through an ethnographic gaze along with some of the theoretical tools provided to us by Gilroy's conceptual framework of the 'ship', as a micro-political and micro-cultural symbol in motion, I examine the different degrees of proximity to "legality" on the Aegean border and the ways in which they relate to claims and perceptions of "Europeanness" by the two sides. In other words, I examine how (ille)gality is (re)produced on the Aegean, what I call degrees of "Europeanness", that is, who is excluded and who is included in the name of "Europe". When referring to the so called "refugee crisis," the Greek government emphasizes how Greece has shown a "human face" to the refugees arriving by boat on the Greek islands, and has thereby projected its "European values." Contrasting this hospitality on the Greek islands with the "inhumanity" on the part of the Turkish state, Greece effectively re-inscribes itself within "Europe" by depicting Turkey as the site, just beyond the borders of "Europe," where "the problem" of a "migration" or "refugee crisis" begins. However, at the same time Turkey is figured as the ultimate site — emphatically "outside" of "Europe" — where a "solution" must be put in place, and, therefore, becomes "valuable European". What satisfies the requirements of upholding "European values", in a context where such a high premium is placed on being useful and valuable to the EU-ropean project and the externalized projection of "European" border zones? This paper focuses on the political instrument of the ship in order to understand where and as what does "Europe" emerges, in this particular space of the Aegean

A forgotten voice: Refugee narratives within an emerging European public sphere.Muhammed Amin (University of Ottawa)

As the current refugee crisis in Europe continues to unfold, much of the media attention has focused on the failure of EU asylum policies and Europe's indifference to meet the increasing humanitarian needs of refugees seeking protection within its borders. Despite the social and political maelstrom that has characterized the crisis, one of its unassuming subtexts has been the emergence of numerous personal refugee narratives, which have never occupied a legitimate space within the confines of the European public sphere. Although overlooked and neglected by more dominant and authoritative actors (i.e. mainstream media, policymakers, anti-immigration groups) in the past, these alternative narratives have permeated into the mainstream European public discourse and have helped deconstruct negative attitudes about refugees and how they fit into an increasingly cosmopolitan and diverse Europe. Given the fact refugees have never been fully recognized as genuine members of a European public sphere, this article seeks to look at the manner in which they can provide an alternative voice within the spatial boundaries of such a polarizing and traditionally one-sided debate. Based on in-depth interviews with both former and current refugees in Europe, such personal narratives help contribute to better understanding the refugee experience, thus accentuating the human element that is often neglected within the discourse on asylum in Europe. It is through them that we are better able to recognize and appreciate the value of such marginalized narratives, thus reinforcing a more inclusive membership in this debate.

The refugee crisis in Lesvos and/as disaster capitalism?

Anja Karlsson Franck (University of Gothenburg)

Ioanna Tsoni (Malmö University)

Around half a million refugees arrived on the Greek Aegean Island of Lesvos in 2015, making it the primary gateway to EUrope. In the absence of a sufficient state response to the mounting humanitarian crisis on these islands, civil society actors have played a crucial role in saving lives at sea as well as in the provision of humanitarian assistance ashore. While local volunteers and communities, with very limited economic recourses, handled refugee reception during the spring and earlier parts of the summer, large international NGOs and volunteer groups have since moved in. As of January 2016 there were more than 80 international NGOs operating in Lesvos whom, together with around 2000 volunteers, have built an impressive rescue and humanitarian assistance infrastructure in many parts of the island. The large-scale arrival of refugees as well as the presence of the international 'rescue industry' has had wide-ranging implications for Lesvos Island. In the following study we approach these implications through mapping the contours of the 'disaster capitalism' that has emerged in the wake of the crisis – highlighting its economic, spatial as well as moral aspects. Based on ethnographic fieldwork conducted in various sites throughout the island, our study will discuss which actors have or have not been able to capitalize upon the compounded crisis as well as show how this relates to the uneven yet distinct geography of refugee reception in the Lesvos (rescue and registration). While such examination highlights important economic geographical outcomes of the crisis in Lesvos island, it also opens up for an interesting discussion around how security, commercial and humanitarian interests overlap as well as differ in the face of the crisis – and how refugees in this process simultaneously become constructed as security threats in need of handling, an unwelcome burden as well as a lucrative asset.

Asylum seekers' journey through a (changing) Europe. In theory and in practice.

Anna Klitgaard (AAU, Venligboerne Samos)

Nicol Savinetti (Global Europeans)

The various scapes of Europe are changing with the sharp increase in the arrival of refugees and immigrants from Syria, Afghanistan, Iran, Iraq, Yemen, Nepal, Morocco, Eritrea, Somalia, Congo, Pakistan, Bangladesh and a host of other countries. With a focus on the mobility, temporal, spatial and the social struggles these asylum seekers and undocumented migrants face, this paper bridges academia and civil society by presenting voices from both institutions. The aim of the paper is to bring Europe's so-called 'refugee crisis' closer to home, relationally. We draw attention to how both existent and non-existent the gap is between them (the asylum seekers) and us (European residents) using a blend of photographic images, storytelling and reflection. The ethnographic accounts, heard through the voice a Danish journalist and activist, give details about the various stages of the journey. The second voice, that of academic and activist, contextualizes the ethnographic accounts within the migration discourse of different disciplines (social psychology, sociology, human geography). By combining methodologies and taking an interdisciplinary approach, we contextualize this historic happening in a manner that is accessible to a wide range of readers thus achieving our goal of sharing new knowledge with a broader cross-section of interest groups.
