1) SUMMARY OF THE PROJECT

Since December 2008 Sweden has more liberal rules for labor immigration from ‘third countries’ (countries outside EU/EEA) than any other OECD country. Swedish employers are free to recruit third-country nationals for any occupation and sector. Before December 2008 Sweden applied restrictive rules based on labor market tests, designed to eliminate temporary bottlenecks and shortages of high-skilled labor. The introduction of employer-driven labor immigration was motivated by the need to address labor shortages that could not be filled solely by people living in EU/EEA countries. The reform significantly curtailed trade union influence on labor immigration practices.

The primary objective of the project is to explain why so many third-country nationals were recruited to sectors characterized by high unemployment and a large share of low-skilled jobs. To test our hypotheses we studied all of the approximately 500 new work permits granted in the restaurant and cleaning sectors in Stockholm in 2012. Using the labor migrant dossiers, business registers and trade union registers of collective agreements we constructed a database to record the migrants, the companies which recruited them, the employment conditions offered and the opinions of trade unions.

The 2008 legislation made it possible to ‘change track’ from asylum seeker to labor migrant after the application for asylum was rejected. One hypothesis was that the demand for work permits from different kinds of track changers accounted for a significant inflow of third-country labor migrants. More than 4 of 10 labor migrants ‘switched track’ from asylum seekers, students or family connection. The ‘pure labor migrants’ accordingly represented fewer than 6 of 10 labor migrants. Many track changers from asylum seekers to labor migrants, however, did not fulfil the formal requirements for track change, which we termed informal track changers.

Another hypothesis was that the new legislation has put third-country labor migrants in a considerably more vulnerable position than other employees, which might make them attractive for employers who seek to exploit this weak position. During the first two years, the labor migrant is bound to a specific employer and occupation. If the migrant loses the job, expulsion from Sweden will follow unless a new job in the same occupation is found within a few months and a new work permit is granted. After four years the labor migrant normally receives a permanent residence permit. Therefore, asylum seekers changing track to labor migrants may for example, be prepared to accept poor working conditions to get a chance to remain in or return to Sweden. The risk of being exploited could be expected to be greatest in companies without collective agreement as unions there have virtually no ability to control working conditions. Every second labor migrant was recruited to such companies.

A third hypothesis was that employers with non-EU background may have preferred using transnational networks to recruit nondomestic workers. More than one of two labor migrants appears to have a nationality/ethnic link to the employer. This is most common among the pure labor migrants and especially among Chinese cooks. In the smallest firms, three quarters of the labor migrants and their employer were co-nationals. Several indicators suggest that many employers take advantage of the vulnerable position of labor migrants. It is possible that employers seek both to help and at the same time exploit co-nationals, particularly in small firms without collective agreements. From other studies the hypothesis that the recruitment of third-country cooks occurred to satisfy the demand for employees in a shortage occupation could be questioned.

The number of new work permits granted to third-country migrants in the restaurant and cleaning sectors increased until 2011 and began to decline in 2012. Tentative explanations for this trend and for the increase in 2017 are presented.
