Meaning and usage variation of feminine and womanly in American literary history: A corpus based case study

Lavinia Ferm

1. Research

The original aim for this case study was to look at how two synonymous lexemes, feminine and womanly, have varied in meaning over time in both British and American literature and also, to see if there was a difference in the usage of the lexemes depending on whether the author was male or female. As can be read in Lyons (1995: 60), lexemes like feminine and womanly would be called near-synonyms in linguistic semantics, which means that they are very similar but not entirely identical in meaning. This particular difference is what this study will try to discover.

All of the examples containing the lexemes were to be collected from an online corpus based on the American and British literary history. However, as the research proceeded, it was found impossible to include any British examples, since the lack of the occurrences of the lexemes in British literature was too great. Furthermore, there were not as many decades to make use of in the British corpus as in the American corpus and because of that, the original question would not have been able to be looked into. This will be explained in more detail in the following section. Therefore, that question was omitted and what was left were the meaning variation and the gender-usage variation in American literature over a period of time, starting from the early 19th century until the late 20th century.

2. Method

The data for this study was to amount to five hundred examples containing the two lexemes. Half of the examples with feminine, divided into both American and British dialects and the other half with womanly, also in both American and British dialects. Furthermore, each half should then be divided into even numbers by decade. Ultimately there should have been approximately seven examples in each decade for both lexemes.

As mentioned above, the data was collected from an online corpus, i.e. Mark Davies Corpus.<sup>1</sup> The corpus includes, among others, The Corpus of Historical American English (COHA) and The British National Corpus (BNC), from where the original data was to be collected. The COHA consisted quite accurately of the desired time period, however the BNC did not and it was at this stage that problems started to occur. In order to try to solve these issues, the idea of creating a new corpus from scratch came to mind.

This process was done by downloading eBooks by British authors from the requested period of time on the Project Gutenberg website.<sup>2</sup> After the majority of the data had been downloaded, the text editing program BBEdit was used to search for the lexemes in each eBook. When only very few occurrences were found in over two hundred books it was obvious that the first aim for the case study was not going to work. The decision to make was whether to stick to the original plan, with the adjustment of not paying much attention to detail to the decades, since there were not many different decades in the BNC. Alternatively, to simply stick to the original plan, only without the British examples altogether. The latter seemed a better option in order to be able to get as much out of the analysis as possible.

When this was decided, the data collection could begin. All of the examples were then taken from the COHA, starting from year 1830 to 1999. Since the British examples were omitted and there were only American ones left, the amount of numbers per decade had to be doubled.

The next step was to copy every example and paste them into BBEdit and then into a Word document so that they could be sorted and cleaned. In the cleaning procedure, only the best examples were chosen to be part of the upcoming analysis. Around ten to fourteen examples per decade and lexeme were selected based on how understandable they were. After the examples had been cleaned, they were put into an Excel file where the analysis was to be done. The analysis was the most time-consuming process of this study.

3. Analysis

When beginning with the analysis, several different variables were added to the coding schema in order to analyze different features of the two lexemes. The variables were chosen based on what information was found in the examples. Most of the variables had a linguistic connection but there were also a few extralinguistic dimensions, such as Decade and Author as we will see below.

What follows in this section is a more detailed explanation of each variable, together with every feature that was found for each category.

3.1. Lexeme

The column named Lexeme consisted of the two main words for this study, namely feminine and womanly. There were 270 occurrences of the word feminine and 229 of womanly. The reason that there were less occurrences with womanly was because there were less examples containing that word in the corpus.

3.2. Year

In this column were all the specific publication years for every literary work. As mentioned, the years extended from 1830 to 1999 for both lexemes. For some decades, it was not possible to find as many examples as for other decades. That is why, in the data set, there are fewer examples for some of the decades.

3.3. Decade

Here the specific years from the previous subsection were divided into decades in order to make it more coarse grained.

Lavinia Ferm

3.4. Century

The decades were then categorized into centuries instead, to make it even more coarse grained. What remained were the 19th and the 20th centuries. In the end, there were 210 occurrences from the 19th century and 289 occurrences from the 20th century.

3.5. Author

In this column, the gender of the author was established. To be able to find out the sex, the example taken from the corpus was copied into Google Books where the results showed whether it was a male or a female writer. The number of male authors amounted to 342 occurrences while the number of female authors was much lower, i.e.157 occurrences. This could be seen as a predictable result since it has always been more common with male authors than with female ones in history.

3.6. Word Class

Here the word class of the lexemes was distinguished. Since both lexemes are adjectives, the distinction between attributive and predicative adjective was made. Even though the vast majority of the features in this column were either attributive (most cases) or predicative adjectives, two occurrences of the word class “noun” were also found. A case when the adjectives feminine or womanly can be used as nouns is that of when they are used as nominalized adjectives or as personifications. These examples can be found in the coding schema under the heading Word Class.

3.7. Polarity

The polarity of the lexemes could be either positive or negative. In most cases, the polarity was established to positive, but there were occurrences with negative polarity as well.

3.8. Collocation

In the collocation-variable, different syntactic structures regarding the lexemes were looked upon. The features found in the first column of collocation were of great variety and number. These will not be included in this section because of the large number but can be viewed in the appended analysis.

3.9. Collocation 2

The features from the first collocation category were grouped into fewer features by renaming most of the already existing categories to names, which suited more than just one feature. The table below shows the features in this variable and the table after it explains what the abbreviations stand for. As we can tell from the table, the lexemes are most often followed by a noun, which is relevant since adjectives are the most common modifiers to nouns. The features marked in bold are the ones with most occurrences, where prepositions with feminine had the highest number.

3.10. Collocation 3

In Collocation 3, all the features from Collocation 2 were kept except for the fact that the lexeme was deleted from the collocation. This was done in order to make it easier to see if the different word classes grouped together with a collocation containing the same word class in the upcoming Correspondence Analysis. The features are demonstrated below in the table.

Table 2. Third level of features in Collocation variable

3.11. Subjecthood

In this category, the position of the phrase, in which the lexeme occurred, was determined. The most common position and clause element was the Direct Object position, which had 197 occurrences. Second most common was the Adverbial position, i.e. when the phrase containing the lexeme was used as an adverbial in the clause. The other features were Subject, Subject Predicative and Object Predicative. The last-mentioned only occurred three times, for instance like in this example: “It made me look more womanly”. In the following list, all of the clause elements are stated with their corresponding number of occurrence.

Meaning and usage variation of feminine and womanly

- Direct Object 197
- Adverbial 110
- Subject 99
- Subject Predicative 90
- Object Predicative 3

3.12. Verb

As for the first column of collocation, there was a great variety of verbs found in the first verb column. They were then duplicated and narrowed down to a second and third column. Therefore will the original verbs not be included in this section either because of the large number, but can be viewed in the appended analysis.

3.13. Verb 2

In the second verb column, all of the original verbs were grouped into the following features listed below. As we can see the verbs expressing some kind of action were the most frequent ones. Some categories are similar in the sense that some verbs could qualify for more than one category. For example, some motion verbs and achievement verbs could be seen as action verbs, depending on how they are looked upon. That is true for state verbs and cognition verbs as well. For this study, they were divided in this way because it seemed most convenient. With the motion verbs for instance, only the verbs that require a movement were included. In the list, we can see how many occurrences there were of each feature and a sample verb from each.

- Action verbs 166 answer
- Copular verbs 144 be
- State verbs 73 want
- Emotion verbs 43 resent

Lavinia Ferm

- Achievement verbs 40 overcome
- Motion verbs 20 enter
- Cognition verbs 13 believe

3.14. Verb 3

Here, the features from the previous verb column were narrowed down to either 'event' or 'state' verbs. The features renamed to 'event' verbs were those of action, achievement and motion. The remaining features were included under 'state' verbs.

3.15. Emphasis

The features in this variable were only two, 'emphatic' or 'non emphatic'. Most examples were used with no emphasis, although there were cases with emphasis as well.

3.16. Meaning

The meaning of the lexemes was determined intuitively by the nearest synonym. Where the lexeme was feminine, the most appropriate synonym was 'womanly' and where the lexeme was womanly, the most appropriate synonym was 'feminine'. This could be seen as quite obvious since they are their closest synonyms. In very few cases, neither of the two synonyms were convenient, so other equivalents for the lexemes were used instead. The synonym 'graceful' occurred eight times and 'delicate' had three occurrences.

3.17. Axiology

The different features in this category were three: 'neutral', 'negative' and 'positive'. Neutral was the most common, since positive and negative were only used when it was very clear that it should be one of the two.

3.18. Humor

In all of the examples, there was not a single case where the lexemes were used in a humorous sense. The lack of humor when talking about something feminine or womanly could be seen as an indication that the lexemes are two serious words and are for that reason not often used with humor.

3.19. Theme

Since Theme is another variable that was duplicated into fewer features, the first column contained a great number of different themes. These will not be included here but can be viewed in the appended analysis.

3.20. Theme 2

After having duplicated the first Theme column, the features remaining are shown in the table on the following page. 'Appearance' was the most common feature, followed by 'femininity', 'feelings' and 'way of being'. Examples with the features of 'femininity' and 'way of being' are demonstrated below, where the first one represents the one for 'femininity'. The fact that these features are the most frequent ones is interesting considering what lexemes are being investigated in this study. It is probably quite natural that when talking about something feminine or womanly, things having to do with appearance, feelings or femininity are often mentioned.

The feature 'misc' stands for miscellaneous and contains all the features that did not fit into any other category. The rest of the features are relatively straightforward, hence they should not need any further explanation. Otherwise, they can be found in more detail in the coding schema.

- (1) a. "Her feminine instinct was to spare the Dean."
- b. "She's quite feminine in many ways."

Table 3. Second level of features in Theme variable

| Theme 2      |               |
|--------------|---------------|
| action       | life          |
| appearance   | misc          |
| education    | opinions      |
| feelings     | relationships |
| femininity   | things        |
| interactions | way_of being  |

3.21. Theme 3

The features from Theme 2 were further divided into Theme 3 with even fewer features. The largest of those was the one about things having to do with people, which indicates that when talking about something feminine or womanly the referent is most often a person, which makes ‘people’ the core meaning. The other features in this column were: ‘states’, ‘situations’ and ‘miscellaneous’.

3.22. Referent 1 Medium

In this variable, all of the referents were divided into smaller categories. Below we can see a list of all the remaining features. The feature for ‘characteristics’ had most occurrences followed by ‘people’.

- Activity
- Aesthetic
- Appearance
- Behavior
- Body Parts
- Characteristics
- Clothing
- Emotion
- Interaction
- Material things
- Miscellaneous
- People

3.23. Referent 1 Type

Before having divided the original referents into the previous variable, they were divided into Referent 1 Type. Here the distinction between abstract and concrete things was made, as well as between human specific or generic, although no examples with human generic was found in this factor. Altogether there were 259 occurrences for abstract things, 163 occurrences for concrete things and 77 for human specific.

3.24. Referent 2 Medium

This variable serves the same purpose as Referent 1 Medium, except that it contains information about Referent 2 and not 1. Since Referent 2 is much more rare, there were fewer features for this variable as well as many NAs (non-applicable), which means that in those cases there did not exist a Referent 2 at all. Apart from the NAs, which represented the majority of the occurrences, the other features were 'appearance', 'miscellaneous' and 'person'.

3.25. Referent 2 Type

As for Referent 1 Type, this variable's function was to make a distinction between abstract and concrete things and for human specific or generic. Most of the existing referents in this variable were human specific, although two cases with human generic were found. There were also occurrences with abstract and concrete things and typically, for Referent 2, a great number of NAs.

3.26. Referent 1 Gender

Here, the gender of Referent 1 was determined. If there was a Referent 1 and it was human, it was mostly a female, as predictable considering the two lexemes. Only four occurrences were found where the referent was male. The rest and also the majority of the cases, were stated as non-applicable.

Lavinia Ferm

3.27. Referent 2 Gender

For Referent 2 Gender, the outcome was very similar to the one for Referent 1 Gender. The only difference was that the numbers for the different features were slightly higher in this variable.

3.28. Referent Mix

In this variable, Referent 1 and 2 Type were mixed in order to create a Referent Type variable without any NAs. This was done by duplicating the Referent 2 Type variable and replacing every NA with the feature in the Referent 1 Type variable. The result can be viewed in the coding schema.

4. Results

In order to try to answer the questions stated in the first section of this case study, several different statistical models were done in the program R. The ones with the most relevant results are represented in this section.

The techniques of Correspondence Analysis and Logistic Regression were used to provide the best outcome. Correspondence Analysis is used to identify relations in the data. As Glynn (2010: 8) points out, the Correspondence Analysis shows what features are related to each other, by grouping them closely together in the plot. The other technique, Logistic Regression, tests probability and the accuracy of the results. If the prediction in the model is correct, it can be assumed that the analysis has managed to apprehend the variation in the data (Glynn 2010: 12). Below follows five plots of Correspondence Analysis and two Logistic Regression models containing significant results with adherent descriptions after the plots.

4.1. Correspondence analysis

Figure 1 seeks to show if different genders use a specific lexeme to refer to something special. As we can see in the lower right of the plot, male authors tend to use referents about characteristics and emotion but also interaction, even though it is found a bit further away from everything else. That is just an indication, in this case, that there were not that many examples when the referent was about interaction. The same goes for clothing in the upper left corner, although it is located more closely to female authors. Female authors are also closely connected to activity, aesthetic and material things.

What is interesting is that body parts, appearance and behavior are found right in the middle of the two genders, which means that both equally use them as referents. The two lexemes are also found in between the genders, although a bit closer to male authors since there were more examples with male than with female authors.

Another interesting aspect of this plot is that people is found in the middle of the two lexemes. This means that when the topic of conversation is something feminine or womanly, the referent is most often a person, which makes people the underlying core meaning of the lexemes. The same conclusion was drawn when discussing Theme 3 earlier.

In figure 2, the individual lexemes were removed to get a clearer result on what referents were used in which decade. The variables involved are hence, Decade and Referent 1 Medium. This plot only contains examples with the lexeme feminine, whereas the next plot we will look at only contains examples with womanly and the next after that is a mixture of both. This was done to see how much the referents differed depending on the decade and lexeme.

What we can tell from this plot is that the lower part contains almost every decade from the 20th century and especially connected are the 1990s with the feature of appearance. In addition, the feature of interaction seems to be linked quite closely to the 1940s. The typical features of the 20th century are then: appearance, body parts, people and interaction. Although also emotion and material things, even though they are not as clear since they are found further up in the center of the plot.

The middle of the plot and upwards belongs to the 19th century. Typical features connected to the 19th century are: behavior, characteristics (especially linked with the 1850s), aesthetic and clothing. Activity and miscellaneous are not as clear as for where they belong.

By looking at figure 4, which is a mixture of the two plots above, we can see that the outcome of mixing the two is very relevant considering how the other plots looked like. This plot though, resembles more the one where only feminine examples were included and this could be because there were more of those examples altogether.

The right hand side shows features from the 20th century and the left hand side from the 19th century. The features from the 20th century are the exact same ones from the first plot where only feminine examples were looked at. As in that plot, ‘emotion’ and ‘material things’ are also found in the center, closely linked with the 1950s but also near the 19th century. Overall, this plot looks almost the same as the first one did.

This plot is trying to show what the different genders tend to write about, i.e. what theme is typical for which gender. As we can tell from the plot, there are clear differences in usage between male and female authors. On the right side of the plot, we can see that female authors are related to the features of life, opinions and especially relationships since it is found much further away from everything else. The features of education and feelings are located in between the two genders, with the exact distance to both, which means that they are used equally often by both.

Male authors and the feature of appearance are found written on top of each other, which means that they are very closely linked. Male authors also seem to write about 'femininity', 'way of being' and 'actions'. The latter one also found further away. The features of interactions and things are also spread over the plot. 'Things' especially, is found the furthest away at the bottom of the plot. Since the distance to the word male is a bit closer, it means that male authors use it as a theme more often than female authors do. The same goes for 'interactions'. Although it is harder to distinguish its distance to the genders in this case, we can see that it leans more towards the left side of the plot that belongs to male authors.

4.2. Logistic Regression

We will now look at two Logistic regression models. After each model follows a description of what was found.

In this model, the response variable used was Lexeme, i.e. either feminine or womanly. The column to the far left contains the different variables that were put into the analysis. The stars or dots to the right indicate how significant the variables are in terms of distinguishing the Lexeme. The closer the numbers in the column to the right are to zero, the more probable it is that the results would be the same or even better if the model were done all over again (Glynn, 2010: 13). As we can see, there are only two stars and one dot altogether, for male authors and for referents about characteristics and behavior. This means that those are the significant variables in the model. The probability for both male authors and characteristics is approximately 97 % chance that the result is accurate and would predict the same if the model were to be done again.

From the estimation column to the left, we can tell that the characteristics features are more important than the male authors features because it has a higher number, although they are both very low. The minus sign before a number tells us that it has to do with the lexeme feminine and without the minus sign it has to do with womanly. Hence, ‘characteristics’ have to do with the lexeme womanly.

The C-value marked in bold can be regarded as a kind of percentage (Glynn, 2010: 13). In this case, it is not that high, approximately 65 %. It should be over 80 % to be a good result. The C-value for this model means either that there is not a big difference in the meaning of the two lexemes, or the analysis is inaccurate or simply that there is not enough data in order to get better and more accurate results.

Although there are significant differences, they are just not important differences since the numbers in the estimation column are very low. The R<sup>2</sup> is also very low, which means that this model is not so powerful for predicting. The number 0,113 indicates that there was variation in the data that the model does not explain.

For this model, Century was used as response variable, i.e. 19th and 20th centuries, where the negative figures represent the 19th century. Referent 1 Medium and Referent Mix were the other two variables included. As we can see from the stars, the significant features in this model are:

- Referent 1 Medium – appearance, interaction and miscellaneous
- Referent Mix – R1 thing abstract and concrete, R2 human specific and thing concrete

Where there are two stars, the chance that it is chance is very low, showed by the low percentage and the probability is nearly 100 % that the results would be the same if the analysis were repeated. Where there is only one star or dot, the probability value is still very good.

The most important feature in the estimation column is the one for interaction. The number 2,23 tells us that this feature was very important in the 20th century, which can be confirmed by looking at the plots containing Decade and Referent a few pages back. Also ‘miscellaneous’ and ‘appearance’ were important features of the 20th century. The features belonging to Referent Mix were all more important in the 19th century, especially ‘R2 human specific’ as we can tell by the high number. Hence, in contrast to the previous model, this model actually shows important differences between the centuries.

The C-value for this model is a bit higher than in the previous one, although still not high enough to say that the results were more than 50 % better than chance.

The R<sup>2</sup> is also quite low here, which means that this too is not a powerful model for predicting.

5. Summary

What this case study was going to explore, was if the meaning of two near synonyms, feminine and womanly, has changed over a period from the 19th to the 20th century in American literature. In addition, to find out if male and female authors use the lexemes differently. In order to do this, five hundred examples were collected from a corpus of literature containing these two lexemes.

After deciding what variables were to form a coding schema and be examined, the analysis could begin. The lexemes were analyzed according to the variables in the coding schema, which produced a variety of features in each variable. Once this process was finished, the data were ready to be tested in order to see if an answer could be found to the questions mentioned in the introduction of this study.

In order to get results, the data were put into a statistical program, R, where two different techniques were used to provide the best outcome, Correspondence Analysis and Logistic Regression. The plots and models selected in this study represent the most relevant and best results. As can be seen by looking at the previous pages, differences in meaning and usage of the lexemes and also usage variations between sexes have been found over the two centuries.

In the 19th century, the lexemes were used more when talking about a person and its qualities, personality, behavior and emotions. While in the 20th century, the lexemes were more associated with appearance, body parts, people and interactions. Hence it could be said that two centuries ago, the focus was more on the internal qualities of a person, when in the 20th century the internal part had developed into an external part, meaning that the outside of a person had become more important than the inside. This change seems quite normal when considering how the world is today, where being attractive physically has become a very important part in many people's lives all over the world.

When it comes to differences in usage between male and female authors, we can establish that there were certain variations in how the lexemes have been used. Male authors use the lexemes when writing about characteristics, emotions and interactions. While female authors use the lexemes more when talking about material things, activities, aesthetics and clothing. However, both genders use the lexemes when referring to appearance, behavior, body parts and people. The latter also proved to be the core meaning when talking about something feminine or womanly. Apart from that revelation, the lexemes seem to have been used quite similarly over the two centuries, hence the constant referent to the lexemes as one. The most distinct difference that was found, was that the lexeme feminine tends to be used more when describing appearance and the like, whereas womanly is more often used when describing a person's qualities.

Due to lack of space and time for this particular study, further investigations could not be made. Although, an interesting continuation could be to look at the genders of the authors and the lexemes separately, to see if an even more clear and accurate result of the differences in usage would present itself.
