Gender effects on love

1. Introduction.

Polysemy, the study of multiple meanings of a lexeme, is part of the field of Lexical Semantics and has been preoccupying linguists for a very long time. Among the first methods of investigation were categorization (Lakoff 1987), and the study of dictionaries in hopes of finding semantic variation in polysemous lexemes (Fillmore and Atkins 1992). In present time however, due to new technology, more innovative, computational methods of investigation are used (Wullf 2007, Glynn 2010).

This study's focus is on the gender variation in usage of the lexeme love, which makes this a study on polysemy and sociolinguistics, to quote Glynn (2010), "variation in social strata, gender, ethnicity, age, and dialect directly influences the use of language".

Also, this study can be considered pioneering in the sense that it investigates gender effects on one single lexeme as well as using a quite unusual method when operationalizing gender variation. Modern techniques will be used to determine statistical significance and predictability of the results. Our claim is that there are gender effects on love, and that, based on general stereotypes, female usage will be uttered in a more romantic and affectionate way, whilst male usage will be less affectionate and more general. The method then, for this research will be the following: we will be looking at two highly gender specific genres, Sci-Fi and Romance fiction, whose works will serve as our corpus.

1.1. Stating study's standpoint

Polysemy in everyday dialogue is not problematic since the intended meaning can be picked up by context of the utterance, and in early research by Byrd et al. (1987) it is stated "that the most commonly used words tend to be the most polysemous". The lexeme chosen for this investigation is just that, describing the broad notion of fondness, and possessing multiple senses, which can also be expressed as a noun or a verb.

Fillmore (1985), the linguist on whose assumptions this study rests on, said that "meaning is understood as all that one knows about the world", which Glynn (2010) later rephrased in a more suiting way for this type of research by, "meaning is how people (in this case men and woman) use words in context".

1.2. Polysemy

One of the most challenging tasks is to make a distinction between polysemy, vagueness and homonymy, since the concepts can be very fuzzy. However, following Gries (2006) definition of polysemy, the distinctions become clearer, "Traditionally, the idea that a word is polysemous entails that the particular lexeme under investigation (i) has more than one distinct sense (otherwise the lexeme would be considered vague) and (ii) that the senses are related (otherwise the lexeme would be considered homonymous)".

This is in agreement with our lexeme of choice since there are several different senses of love; platonic, state, feeling, preference etc. In which Geeraerts (2010) further accommodates by, "if a word is polysemous, the usual meaning involves a set of related meanings, a cluster of different well-established senses".

Also important to mention, this study will base its assumptions of polysemy on the prototypical approach, which is used to explain meaning of words, with the support of linguists such as Fillmore, Lakoff, Geeraerts. This approach, as Yael Ravin (2000) best describes, "emphasize meaning as part of a larger cognitive system and relate it to mental representations, cognitive models and bodily experiences".

Moreover, "word meanings are seen as having sets of necessary and sufficient conditions that are interpreted against a background of knowledge (Fillmore 1982)". Fillmore continues by stating that "prototypicality characterizes the degree to which the situation in the world, or our understanding of it, fits the assumptions that form part of the idealized concept". To put these statements in use, let us consider the lexeme love. Dependent on the gender of the Agent, the gender of the Patient, a shift from one sense to another is predictable. If a male refers to love where the recipient is his mother, it most certainly is another 'kind of love' than if the recipient would happen to be his girlfriend. With the background of knowledge that the love showed toward a romantic interest is not the same as it being platonic, the assumption that love holds several meanings is clear. More about the different senses of love will be discussed in a upcoming paragraph.

1.3. Sociolinguistics

Now moving on to the factor that will determine usage variation and distinguish if love is polysemous, and that is gender. Sociolinguistics focuses on natural language and language variation influenced by society. More precisely, this study is part of the subfield of micro-sociolinguistics that investigate variables such as class, age and, our factor of choice, gender.

Previous research on gender effects is considered flawed, the reason for the most part being poor methodology. These consisted at first of sociolinguistic interviews and tape recordings, which lead to insincere results, since people unconsciously, alter their way of speaking when knowing that they are studied. Even to this day, the methods are not ideal, since no well-rounded corpus is existent that show gender factors. Now back to the result found in previous gender variation studies. Most of them are very similar (Wolfram 1969, Trudgill 1972, Nichols 1982), all indicating a variation in language style between men and women. In general, men speak more dialectal than woman, and women embracing a more Standard form of English. Somewhat farfetched, these results can be seen as in agreement with the hypothesis that men will use love in a careless way, referring to preference of things, whilst women will stick to the more standard usage; feelings.

2. Etymology of love. Semantic variation.

The different senses of love have been mentioned, and is believed to be the key difference in usage of the lexeme, so a run-through of the different ‘kinds of love’ that were considered in this study is necessary. To begin with, love comes from Old English lufu, which on that hand came from Old High German luba. The primary sense then was in describing fondness of someone in a romantic way, but platonic usages also existed. The verb later derived from the noun and the adjective came last (The Concise Oxford Dictionary of Etymology).

In present time the lexeme love has far more usages. The following section is the many meanings followed by actual examples in the corpus.

The Oxford English Dictionary defines the usage of the noun as:

I. Senses relating to affection and attachment.

1. a. A feeling or disposition of deep affection or fondness for someone, typically arising from a recognition of attractive qualities, from natural affinity, or from sympathy and manifesting itself in concern for the other's welfare and pleasure in his or her presence (distinguished from sexual love at sense 4a); great liking, strong emotional attachment; (similarly) a feeling or disposition of benevolent attachment experienced towards a group or category of people, and (by extension) towards one's country or another impersonal object of affection.

3. Method

The data was compiled by Dylan Glynn at the University of Lund. It consisted of works from the genres Romance fiction and Sci-Fi, available on the Internet. The data resulted in 2,593 works by 436 authors. From there, a corpus was made, containing the same amount of examples from each work, author and genre. The keyword was love, and at this point we didn't favour a specific word class or sense. Further on, the corpus needed some more cleaning up. Examples where there weren't enough semantic information were excluded. Also, the reoccurring sentence I love you was excluded if it did not hold more context on the side. The corpus was now ideal, consisting of 603 sample sentences with the lexeme love. From there, the occurrences were manually annotated by a total of 17 factors in which they could be further classified into 125 features. These factors tested for a variety of things, such as syntax, figurativity, possessiveness, sense, argument, animacy of actors and genders of actors etc.

This method was used by Glynn (2010) and was successful, and he explains why, "depending on the representativity of the corpus, results can be argued to describe the most conceptually salient usage of a lexeme or its prototype structure, as well as capture differences between register and dialect. Moreover, and perhaps most importantly, it may reveal how such factors affect each other in the semantic structure of a lexeme. In other words, for a given register, speech situation, or dialect, one reading of a word may be more salient than another".

4. Results. Multiple Correspondence Analysis

In the investigation of gender effects on love, this study will use Multiple Correspondence Analysis as a technique to show for correlation of factors dependent on gender. This technique calculates correlations of the factors by their instances in the corpus. The Multiple Correspondence Analysis plots can be simply interpreted as follows: factors that often co-occur in the examples in the corpus are grouped together, and those on each other's opposite sides are not correlated at all. Also, factors which are far away can be highly correlated with whatever factor it is directly connected to. To be noted here as well is that these plots do not say anything about statistical significance or predictability, but are still very useful in investigating differences in usage of two genders.

4.1. Senses

The first factor that will be considered is sense, since as mentioned previously; there are a great deal of, and could be the prominent difference in usage of the lexeme. Figure 1, shows the correlation to the different genres and senses, as well as the two word classes noun <NP> and verb <VP>. The senses are annotated in the plot as Preference, <preference_abstract> or <preference_concrete>, the different types of love as <sexual>, <romantic>, <agape> (religious love) and <platonic>. Also, whenever someone addresses their beloved with 'my love', is annotated as <vocative>, and love as a <state> or <thing>.

Firstly, notice that the word classes specified as <NP> and <VP>, are not directly correlated to any genre, they are placed in between the genres and are therefore excluded as influential factors in usage variation. The first noticeable cluster shows us that Sci-Fi is correlated to the love senses: <platonic>, <preference_concrete> and <agape>. This is very interesting, because the senses clustered together show barely any semantic similarity; platonic love towards family members or colleagues, have nothing in common with preference for e.g.

money, or religious love. The examples (1a) – (1c) show what the results look like, with actual instances in the corpus.

(1) a. Disney shows about how much parents love their kids. How there's some sort of

b. Ah, Chicago. You just gotta love big, sprawling American cities. Ain't modern living

c. And when this bitter world is unmade and we have returned into the love of the Gods I will

Also, a looser cluster is found, which show that Romance correlates to the senses <romantic>, <state>, <preference_abstract> and <sexual>. Here, the senses are more similar, <romantic> and <sexual> and in agreement with the hypothesis.

The following examples (2a) – (2d) are instances in the corpus which represent the results.

(2) a. her first love. Perhaps, with a link hick, I will be her last.

b. And love. He had no doubt he was in love. A man couldn't feel such an irresistible

c. Jessie felt the smile blossoming from her heart. "I love a happy ending.

d. becoming one with her. And together they would love the night away again and again. She

Now, we have added another factor, Actor types, and those are Agent and Patient, <maleAgent>, <femaleAgent>, <malePatient>, <femalePatient>, as well as <inanimatePatient>, because of the Preference sense.

This plot shows the already mentioned correlation between <scifi> and <platonic> love, and the connection between <scifi> and Preference. Moreover, the <InanimatePatient> further encourages that statement, since Preference most often is towards an object. Examples (3a) – (3d) show what the examples in the first cluster look like in the corpus.

- (3) a. hundred years ago Mark Twain fell in love with it and wanted to stay on forever
- b. Instead of filial love and devotion, I felt a sudden towering rage at having
- c. do you know I always love video stories about your Traders such big,
- d. “Neither,” Sergeant Yurivan insisted. “I just love the concept this General dreamed up.

Furthermore, the other half of the plot shows the other four senses in concurrence with both types of Agent and Patient. What is very interesting here is that, when women are the Agent in occurrences of love, the usage often tends to be in a romantic way or a state, as in ‘in love’ with a person. On the other hand, when a female is the Patient of love, it is often in a sexual way.

Some examples representing those results in the corpus are showed in (4a) - (4b).

(4) a. Paul and I are in love, Trudy had breathed, airy as a romance heroine, as if that were

b. couldn't get enough of her; he made love to her again and again.... They finally

To further investigate the correlation between the senses and the genres/genders, which seems to be the factor causing usage variation, another Multiple Correspondence Analysis was made. This time, the focus is on examples where adjectives are premodifying love in the corpus, which were not so many in number, 42 in total, to see if how love is premodified tells us something about the usage of the different genders. For the plot to be visible, the adjectives were further categorized into groups playing on conceptual metaphors. It ended up as <FAMILY> (filial, brotherly etc.), <LACK_OF_SENSE> (feral, mad, lost etc.), <TRUE> (real, pure etc.), <INTENSIFIER> (grand, fierce, great etc.), and <HOT> (steamy, passionate etc.). Also, the different Actor types were kept in the plot.

The first thing that is striking is that the adjectives in Sci-Fi seem to have a female Agent and a male or inanimate Patient. As well as for the loose cluster on the other side of the plot, where in Romance fiction, the man is the Agent and the Woman a Patient of the love.

Also, this plot is in cohesion with the previous, since here, <scifi> is highly correlated to <FAMILY> and familial premodifiers, and in the previous one, Sci-Fi was correlated with the sense <platonic>. Also what is interesting is the grouping of adjectives in <LACK_OF_SENSE>, which suggests a negative context of love, whenever mentioned with a man as the Patient.

Examples (5a) - (5b) show such occurrences in the corpus.

(5) a. Elric—there are two things you will never again have—my sister's love and the

b. Without training and emotional preparation the bond could be destructive, resulting in obsessive love

In Romance fiction it seems to be the opposite, all positive adjective groups are clustered together. Also, the results from the previous MCA showing a correlation between female Patients and the sense <sexual> is further encouraged here, with the adjective group <HOT>. The following examples show such instances in the corpus.

(6) a. the knowledge that a unique man's true love and passion would give her the necessary

b. Isobel knew that Hadrian felt no burning love for Elizabeth, caring for

5. Confirmatory results using Logistic Regression

As mentioned, the Multiple Correspondence Analysis is a technique in measuring co-occurrences between factors, and the results were on point, showing a usage-variation between the two genders. The next part of the study will investigate if the results are statistically significant and if they can be predictable. The technique used is Logistic Regression, which with statistics calculates chance value, prediction strength and statistical significance. This technique will only test the results of the two first MCA's, since the adjectival conceptual metaphor groups are not factors in language use.

Unfortunately, the result only show for the Romance-genre, and that <sexual> and <state> are very favourable senses of the female gender, as well as <thing>, <vocative> and <preference_abstract>. Also, the chance value is low, which means we cannot exclude that these results are just chance.

Table 2. Logistic Regression. Genre, Sense and Gender or Agent and Patient.

This latter table, incorporating gender of Agent and Patient unfortunately does not show any results on those factors. On the other hand, the senses <state> and <sexual> are still highly preferred by the female gender. Also, the chance value is a bit higher but still not quite up to par, and the statistical significance, and predictability strength value is high.

6. Summary and discussion

The goal with this study was to prove that the lexeme love is used differently between men and women, and therefore not having the same meaning. After gathering data in an unusual way, using gender-biased fiction genres, a corpus was created and Multiple Correspondence Analysis plots made. As a reminder, our hypothesis was roughly based on common gender stereotypes, and that woman would use love in a romantic and affectionate way whilst men do the opposite, not displaying much emotion and using love as a way to generally show fondness.

Our main prediction was that the several senses of love would be the factor triggering variation in usage, and so it did. Men used love in contexts with senses such as platonic, religious and preference, and woman in contexts of romantic and sexual senses. Also, it was demonstrated that there were no difference in usage of the lexeme dependent on word class.

The second time around, factors of actors were added to the plots, with confirmatory and somewhat surprising results. Men again used love in contexts of senses of preference and platonic. The actor type that was most co-occurring in Sci-Fi was the inanimate Patient, further encouraging men's favourable sense of preference.

The most interesting finding must be in Romance fiction. The actor types female Agent and male Patient co-occurred in contexts of love being a state or romantic. This can be interpreted as women using love when talking about affection and in other tender ways, which is in agreement with our hypothesis. More interestingly, when love occurs in instances with a male Agent and Female Patient, the sense most co-occurring was sexual. This can be interpreted as following: when woman see themselves as the recipients of love by a male Agent, it most times involves the sexual sense. Also, existent adjective in the corpus were investigated which confirmed most of the results above. Unfortunately, the last plot featuring the actor types did not show any confirmations in the Logistic Regression, concerning gender of Agents and Patients in relation to senses, but did confirm the results on senses and genres.

To sum up, this study has been successful in demonstrating a difference in gender usage of love, proving that the lexeme is polysemous.

"And you'll marry me again and LOVE the baby no matter what that piece of Jessie felt the smile blossoming from her heart. "I LOVE a happy ending, declined. He wouldn't bite her, he wouldn't make LOVE to her—he wouldn't even kiss remark, made LOVE to him again when he'd all but said she didn't mean enough to him even to try. she swivelled a look at him. "Have you? I mean, ever fallen in LOVE with a piece of land?" knew she had worried for naught. His LOVE for her glowed from inside him have need to hide her LOVE for this wonderful man. Joy soared up inside her reviving hope, promising LOVE.

Could LOVE break this darkness and LOVE, happiness, and peace had claimed to LOVE him beyond life, in her stables and intimately engaged with the boy who cared for her father's innumerable hunting dogs. At that moment he knew that LOVE was nothing more than a word Davis laughed outright "Ain't LOVE grand."

Paul and I are in LOVE, Trudy had breathed, airy as a romance heroine, as if that were enough to explain how When LOVE comes, you accept it, wherever it may lead, Trudy had said in that feminine trill she'd adopted. "Sweet, sweet woman, I still can't believe you LOVE me."

"Yes, my LOVE," she said through happy tears. In a moment, with her head on far too long since he'd made LOVE to her in this room. Somehow he'd forgotten how the smell of lilacs affected him. Well, it wouldn't be long now. She'd be here soon, and he'd hold her and LOVE her to his heart's content. changed, Mandy. I'm still the same man inside, the same man you fell in LOVE with before. And I'm the man you'll LOVE again. And though she would LOVE and miss Graham forever, she would always have that kind of LOVE with a man is an extraordinary gift. Your life was Alfred sent him a keen look. "On the contrary, I pray you'll someday know such LOVE yourself."

LOVE, he realized in faint astonishment. So this is LOVE. Resentment oozed over the wounds of the past. How dearly she'd LOVE to give that scoundrel lord a Fergus spoke in a husky, demanding murmur. We want to make LOVE Fergus grabbed her chin and glared at her. Damn right we do. We LOVE you and we want to stay "A warm, passionate tale of LOVE and redemption,

Once the dam had broken, they'd made LOVE wherever and whenever they could. She swallowed After that, she'd wanted to get married immediately, to spend her life adoring him, making LOVE Hadrian will listen to me, and Charles will listen to Hadrian. I promise you. But for the LOVE of God,

"If you LOVE me," she whispered to Maeniel, "take me somewhere clean."

"Don't forget to mention how you LOVE to sit in front of a roaring fire, listen to rain on the roof and go for long walks on the beach." He was acutely aware of the need to seal the bond of their LOVE in the most primal way there was, to start the process of overlaying two, when they were betrothed. Isobel knew that Hadrian felt no burning LOVE for Elizabeth, caring for her as one might care for a sister, just as she was certain that Elizabeth did LOVE him, and not as one would LOVE a brother. That, of course, was not her business. The most important thing was that Hadrian waited my entire life to LOVE you."

another part was dismayed. He talked of possessing, but not of LOVE; of his body's needs, but not of his speaking to." If he had professed his LOVE, she probably would have ... But it would be a lie. No, it's marriage to a nice prince who'd LOVE her and settle down and have half a dozen LOVELY children. But now, She has fallen in LOVE with John Itawasa, but the thought of another emotional attachment is

"Don't let a bad experience keep you from LOVE, Myra. John adores you and your daughter. He folks who'd talked to her about what real LOVE was like. And now they were dating again. He'd in her hand, a stone figurine meant to last forever, for a LOVE that would last forever.

He shook his head. "That's not what I meant. You've never made LOVE with the lights on before, have further than you've ever gone with anyone else, because I seem to have fallen in LOVE with you."

I watched my own wild-eyed gaze in his pupils and realized that I very might well be in LOVE with him, given all the LOVE I could and helped him what to say. "Then drink, my LOVE. Let me save you. Let me save us both."

fertile imagination and a LOVE of both Romance and Science Fiction fuel her writing. Her favorite stories are those of strong, honorable people -- whatever the race or planet of origin -- who are driven by LOVE

There was no way a woman like this would be marrying his inarticulate, inexperienced nephew out of LOVE. Indeed, i he could have believed that she had fallen in LOVE with his nephew, dazzled, perhaps, by his genius, or filled planted firmly in her rosebud mouth. His heart expanded with LOVE. She'd learned not to LOVE too deeply or too intensely, because people often didn't LOVE you back, or they disappeared, or died.
