A linguistic corpus-driven approach to American domestic politics

Michael Zetterholm

1. Introduction

Using the modern cognitive linguistic framework of recorded corpora data, this essay attempts to investigate the political climate in American domestic politics as it is represented by media in the form of newspapers. By approaching the language usage of media in a linguistically holistic way I aim to elicit subtle attitudes towards ideologies present in news press articles. This approach is carried out by analyzing the usage of certain political concepts in American newspapers together with the American magazine TIME on the assumption that the concepts vary depending on which political party is in power on a national level. The idea was to use a non-traditional way to explore the attitude towards the political parties through the concepts used to represent them in newspapers. The concepts are analyzed against the background of which of the two political parties is in power, the Democratic Party or the Republican Party, following a diachronic pattern starting with the George W. H. Bush administration in 1989 up to the current Barack Obama administration. In between these lie Bill Clinton (Democratic Party), who served two terms, and George W. Bush (Republican Party) who also served two terms. Three terms of each party in power with a representing president in the White House will serve as the background for the analysis of how political concepts are viewed in the American media. How are the ideologies treated in the media depending on which political faction is in power?

1.1 Political Background

American politics has recently seen the rise of a very right wing conservative movement called the Tea Party movement with strong conservative opinions and a strong opposition to president Barack Obama. The emergence of the Tea Party movement is believed to be a culmination of the increasing polarization that is happening in American politics – when political opinions goes to the extremes on a right-left wing spectrum. It is speculated that sentiments for polarization has been on the rise for at least the last decade. The usual method for eliciting data from citizens is through polls from which generalizations are made to represent the views of the country. As politics often is the topic of discussion in media it seemed like a reasonable option to polls for eliciting sentiments towards ideologies.

1.2 Methodical Background

One branch of modern cognitive linguistics is the corpus driven research where the foundation is a database of utterances made by native speakers with many significant differences such as spoken or written language, different genres among other things. The corpus is a database made up of language as is used by speakers. A corpus provides great insight in how grammar is really used, and has been used, based on empirical groundwork. Researching the corpus can help in understanding how certain features are used and why one is used over another.

Corpus research is also relatively objective in terms of what context a given word or phrase appears in. When searching a corpus database, any number of hits are generated through keyword searches. These appear together with a limited context, usually the entire sentence the keyword belongs to. Other relevant information also appears, such as the source, genre and register. The objectivity lies in the wide search; everything corresponding to the search parameters is shown. There is no discrimination towards certain authors or newspapers. It is via this medium of usage based information this study will gather its data.

2. Data and method

The data, which consisted of small text extracts from newspapers and the magazine TIME, was collected from the Corpus of Contemporary American English (COCA) and the COCA TIME corpus. Initially the project was aimed at describing the political coverage of TIME magazine alone by analyzing certain lexemes that are strongly linked with politics to represent different ideologies on a general spectrum.

The original proposition was to find out how the American public media had treated socialism and other similar concepts close to it, after having had two left wing presidents that from a naïve European perspective were very successful compared to other contemporary administrations. However, this was quickly brought to a halt as the ill chosen words had very few occurrences and data sparseness forced a change of direction. Having read hundreds of examples of which none had anything to do with American domestic politics, but rather foreign politics, something had to change. Broadening the scope and revising the concepts chosen to analyze and narrowing the ideas to better suit American domestic politics the project now encountered another issue namely that of too much noise in the data set. The new words chosen were liberalism and conservatism. The last 21 years of presidency has seen both parties representing those ideas in power in the white house – the democrats and the republicans. Due to the limits of the corpora very little data had been gathered during Barack Obama’s era and he is omitted from the statistical analysis but present in the manual analysis.

Other groups and organizations that appear in the newspapers also have traits of conservatism and liberalism; most noticeably in the data were various religious groups in a conservative or liberal context. Examples such as (1) were not uncommon in the data

- (1) *has often made lists of potential popes because of his intellect, language skills and conservatism, but his administrative skills may seem lacking. #The Latin American cardinals

As seen in sentence (1) [emphasis mine] the bolded words indicate that this context has very little do to with American domestic politics and had to be deleted upon being read. Consequently the data began with close to 800 examples and was narrowed down to 515 relevant and useful items.

These were manually analyzed for both linguistic and non-linguistic features to capture the entire scope of the context. The factors were syntactic variation in the immediate context of the chosen word, the main verb associated with the word, the axiology, the experiencer or topic and the possessiveness of the experiencer. The non-linguistic factors pertained to what year the example was from and which party was the one in power at the publication of the article the example belonged to. The non-linguistic factors were which party was in power, which president was in power, if there was a midterm that year or not and which term the president was sitting. These factors prompted some additional research outside of the linguistic field into recent American political history.

2.1 Data Analysis

As previously mentioned the data extracts were individually read and coded in accordance with a schematic that was intended to capture significant information in the data. Outside of basic information such as where the example was from, what year it was published and which lexeme was of interest there are several other factors. The coding schema contained basic syntactic variation such as the immediate construction of which the lexeme was found.

- (2) A central tenet of liberalism is government's guarantee that everyone, working or not, needy or not

In sentence (2) the syntax would be recorded as of_NP with liberalism being the noun phrase. The main verb in the same sentence is a variation of the verb to be and is as such recorded as the infinitive be. This was partly to help with the later analysis but also to help reveal interesting conceptual metaphors that might be significant to the overall interpretation of the attitudes towards ideologies. Unfortunately due to time constraints this is not covered in this paper. The next category is where the main criticism of the data should be aimed, namely the axiology factor which was coded in three features – the clearly positive or negative and the examples where it is either too little context to make an accurate judgment or there is no clear axiology attached. These were recorded as pos, neg and nonpos respectively. Sentence (3) is an example of the negative axiology, mainly encoded into the main verb destroy.

- (3) Long ago, before liberalism destroyed this country, Italians, Irish, Polish, Germans, etc., all

The axiology was undoubtedly the most difficult factor to properly operationalize to avoid as much subjectivity as possible. It is not as easy and straightforward as identifying basic word classes or syntactic patterns. It demanded an interpretation of each individual example, this meant it was also the most time consuming factor to code.

Sentence (3) is an easy example to clearly illustrate how the axiology coding was done. However, the most common verb was to be with 87 occurrences which made it much harder and not necessarily as easy as (3) might make it seem. The next factors are experiencer, the topic or target of the lexeme. Again in sentence (3) the experiencer would be recorded as nation as the sentence is aimed at the concreteness of the country, which was differentiated from the abstractness of the feature society, the difference was decided upon on an individual basis between the sentences. The next factor possessiveness was coded only using the genitive construction when the lexeme was the object of ownership because of the ambiguity of the of construction, and if the genitive construction was used with one of the chosen lexemes it be a marked construction worthy of further investigation.

The non-linguistic factors were coded in agreement with the year of the example, referring to the date a president took office, which was early January for all of the four presidents chosen in the study.¹ This seemed more reasonable than using the year of election as the sitting president is still in power during the election and the dates given in the corpora were not detailed enough to make sweeping distinctions within single year spans. Presidents are also representative of the years they sit because the dates from the examples are taken from the corpus and the non-linguistic factors are mapped based on dates of occurrence. For example George Bush was president in office early January 1989 through 1992, which means the examples coded for George Bush are also coded for that specific time, this is important to remember when interpreting the plots later in the essay. The presidents were added to have the examples represent the era they were in office and their decisions and policies could have a strong influence on published articles. That means the plots also represent a diachronic perspective. The party affiliation was noted down in agreement with the president.

The midterm factor was coded in relation to the year as midterm or no_midterm in correspondence with if there was a midterm that year or not. Lastly it was noted down which term the president was sitting in relation to the year the examples came from, if it was their first or second term.

Following sentence (4) is an example of the entire coding schema pertaining to (4).

- (4) Times is the zest with which it drives five or six stakes per day through liberalism's evil heart.

These are the features of this particular text extract serving as an example as to how the coding was recorded in the data: 1990, liberalism, NP, drive, neg, idea, nonpos, first_term, Republican, G_Bush, midterm, NewYorkTimes

2.2 Correspondence analysis

When attempting to identify usage pattern in the data the statistical tool correspondence analysis was employed to plot relations between features by converting a mathematical multidimensional table of the features into a two dimensional plot. With this technique the distance between features roughly corresponds with the grade of association between the factors: close distances are meant to signify a relation of distinctly associated features while long distances are interpreted as disassociated features.

Figure 1 shows the relation between the president who was in power with the axiology of the lexeme that was analyzed. There is a relation between B_Clinton, liberalism and the nonpos feature of the axiology, which simply is the label given to the state where no positive or negative attitude was clearly detectable. The examples with liberalism published during the Bill Clinton era are highly associated with a neutral axiology. The conservatism examples are more associated with both extremes of the spectrum, the clearly negative and positive examples. This would suggest that the Republic faction is more polarized in newspaper articles during Republican rule than the Democrats. Earlier the importance of the duality of the presidential factor was discussed and this is where it is important to remember the implications of it. The presidents stand for a given time, the time they were in office. The result of this is how the plots are interpreted, namely that during a presidential rule, the president factor, the lexeme is treated according to the axiology they are close to. Thus the plot suggests a theme of when a Democratic president is in power the lexeme corresponding to their ideology is treated with a more neutral axiology in articles. In contrast during Republican rule, especially during George Bush, the word associated with their ideology, conservatism, is treated more polarized, either distinctly positive or negative, with all the related factors being at the bottom of the plot creating a division between the top and bottom half of the plot. Another plot that further indicates that during the period of time when the Democratic Party was in power has received a more neutral representation is figure 2.

Again the Democrat feature is closely associated with the nonpos feature of the axiology, in accordance to how it interacted with the president who represented the Democrats. The Republican feature is more distinctly associated with the negative aspect than the positive, but still not as close to the nonpos as the Democrat feature is. With the help of figure 2 one could argue more clearly that the Republican Party is subject to more polarization. It is important to remember that these articles are not necessarily published by representatives of either party but should rather be seen as a representation of the result of public discussion and opinion reflected by the media. As such the public opinion seems to be that the Republican movement is more extreme than the Democratic movement and also that it is a more negatively colored polarization.

2.3 Statistical Relevance

The plots discussed earlier suggest an interesting theme in American media, namely that during democratic rule their ideology is treated with more lenience while the republican ideology receives harsher judgment in articles. However, is there any empirical proof that further suggests this trend is actually representative of how the lexemes are used? Do the plots reveal anything about the language use of the lexemes? Are they representative of how one can expect them to be used in similar contexts? These questions can be answered by running a statistical verification method on the data used in the correspondence analysis to provide mathematical evidence of how accurately these plots depict actual usage. The technique is called logistic regression and will calculate the statistical significance and the statistical strength of the model. It will determine if the plotted results are mere coincidence or not.

The column of the left are the features from the Figure 1 plot tested here for statistical significance and statistical strength. The statistical significance is represented by the P value which determines the likelihood of the pattern being chance or not, with a value being close to zero indicating strong statistical significance, high probability that the pattern is not chance. The value 0.3529 above would indicate that the tested pattern is not high probability of being the work of chance but it is still low enough to represent a relative significance. A repeat of the analysis is not likely to produce different vastly different results but not identical results either.

The other value of interest is the C value which indicates the predictive strength of the model, if the pattern of features can be used to predict future cases. The desired number will be close to 1.0 to indicate, in percentages, how likely a prediction would be. With a value of 0.556 the predicative strength is 55.6%, which is only 5.6% better than chance and as such the model has practically no predicative strength at all. However, even without the predicative strength the numbers together with the plots still represent evidence of an actual pattern in the data.

3. Summary

Data representative of the American media was analyzed manually in search of patterns in the language that would reveal attitudes toward how the media is influenced by the national power holders. The data was collected from a corpus in a usage based approach to language, after overcoming initial obstacles with the data, correspondence analysis and logical regression analysis were applied to detect any usage patterns and verify the significance and probability of these. The correspondence analysis revealed interesting patterns between axiology and ideologies that corresponds to popular theories that the American political situation is becoming more polarized. However, the verification method did not reveal any corroboration of the evidence found suggesting the results are valid beyond this data set.

4. Conclusion

This study has attempted to explore political concepts in American domestic politics. Patterns representative of a usage based meaning was found in the data but the results could not be verified to representing a coherent evolution in the usage of the word beyond the immediate data set to the degree that future use could be predicted.

An empirical word study is only as good as the data it is investigating and perhaps the main factor was an inadequate operationalization to counteract the innate subjectivity of the manual coding rendering the data faulty. The almost complete lack of statistical strength in comparison to the relatively strong statistical significance would suggest that the lexemes are easily manipulable and any attempt to predict the usage over a large data set would prove futile as they are relatively prone to changes in use. It is hard to determine for how long there has been a polarization of the Republican Party based on the evidence provided in this study, but it would indicate that has existed and still does in the modern American political climate. The statistical tools served their purpose in identifying and providing evidence for a pattern existing in the data set, which reflects and supports the hypothesis of attitudes in the media. However, the evidence found could not be further supported or verified by the logistic regression.
